a A large number attend school beyond the school age, which carries the enrollment above the total school population, so that the absence of those of school age does not appear. b Allowing one teacher to each fifty pupils. c Allowing one school-house of a cost of $300 to fifty pupils. d Allowing one year at a normal school at a cost of $250. e This is the additional cost of a school of three months for the non-attending persons of school age according to the returns for 1881; other returns can be made for 1882. f This is an expense incurred by each parent, and, though not a public tax, is a part of the additional expense to be incurred by the communities.

Mr. President, the Committee on Education and Labor has also reported another bill, the purpose of which is to provide a perpetual fund for distribution among the States and Territories for the support of common schools. For the first ten years it is proposed that that distribution be made on the basis of illiteracy, and ever afterward on that of actual population. The proposition is to found a fund, and to increase that fund by placing to its account every year the proceeds of the sales of public lands and one-half the income from the land grant railroads of the country, so called, and to distribute not the money itself thus received, but the interest thereof.

Of course at the beginning the amount for distribution would be very trifling, as the interest upon the three, four, or five million, whatever the amount might be, which would be passed to the credit of this fund as the accumulation from the two sources mentioned for the first year would be very little indeed, but gradually it would increase, and in the course of ten years the amount of interest that would be likely to accrue for distribution would become of essential consequence. It might reach in ten years the amount of three or four million dollars, and ever afterward it would continue to increase.

That bill has in substance been before the country for ten or twelve years. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] whom I do not now see in his seat was one of the earliest and strongest advocates of that measure, and the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has identified his name with it as he has with so many other of the great measures of legislation which have been enacted during the last twenty years in this country. That measure has received the sanction of the Senate upon, I think, more than one occasion. It has failed to pass the House of Representatives heretofore. At some time that bill will come up for consideration by the Senate.

The Committee on Education and Labor looked upon these two bills as entirely harmonious in their relation with each other, the one now being discussed relating only to a temporary exigency, proposing to distribute a larger amount of money immediately to reach an existing difficulty, in order to equalize the educational condition of the country as a whole, and the other bill would naturally supplement it, and about the time the fund from the temporary-aid bill shall disappear something substantial will be coming from this.

I make these remarks at this time in order that I may introduce, as bearing upon the general subject of national aid to education and as contributing something to the symmetry of the discussion, which must include that bill earlier or later, certain documentary matter. I present table No. 25, showing the aggregate amount received from the disposal of public lands in the past twenty years, and one-half the yearly amount received from the railroads, and the yearly income to be derived upon an average yearly amount at 4 per cent. for each of the next ten years for school purposes; a like table, No. 26, giving the income from railroads from three and a half years; and table No. 27 showing the disposals of the public lands and the amount received therefrom in each fiscal year from July 1, 1862, to June 30, 1882, inclusive. I think these tables, in connection with the others which I have already introduced, will furnish to the Senate and to everybody practically all the statistical information that exists in this country in the possession of the Government, from its archives, as bearing on the subject-matter of education.

In addition to the area and amount given for 1882 there were disposed of Indian lands 310,386.13 acres for $634,617.22, which, added to the total for 1882, make a grand total for 1882 of 14,309,166.40 acres and $8,394,516.04.

Mr. President, I now come to certain propositions which I think are fairly deducible from the premises already laid down. These propositions are, I think, true:

First. That intelligence and virtue generally diffused among the masses of the people are necessary conditions to the existence of republican governments in the nation and in the States.

Second. That in so far as ignorance and vice exist republican governments fail, and that although the forms of freedom may continue, yet the substance will be eaten out and ultimately the fabric itself will fall.

Third. That there is now in all parts of the country a dangerous degree of ignorance among the people, and that those invested with the sovereignty, which is the suffrage, are by reason of ignorance to a dangerous degree unfitted to exercise the functions of government.

Fourth. That this mass of ignorance is increasing and not diminishing, although there has been a slightly greater increase of population than of illiteracy relatively during the decade from 1870 to 1880 in the country as a whole.

Fifth. That in many parts of the country conditions are growing rapidly worse rather than better, and that the evil is of that peculiar nature that the local power and disposition to apply the remedy grows less as the necessity for it increases.

Sixth. That the danger to the country is everywhere, although the disease may be largely local; that ignorance anywhere circulates everywhere and poisons the political and social life of each State and of the whole people.

Seventh. That the remedy must be applied by those who perceive the danger; that if there is anywhere indifference to the remedy it proves that there is the more occasion for its use, and that the insensibility of the patient requires at once such measures on the part of those still in relatively sound health as will prevent the spreading of the plague; and that the cry of physicians and nurses for help should control our action rather than the convulsions or the stolidity of the patients.

Eighth. But in this case there is neither indifference nor stolidity; there is simply an inability to combat the plague unaided and a cry of distress. Ignorance is worse in a republic than the pestilence.

Ninth. That the exceptional degree of illiteracy prevailing in some parts of the country as it constitutes a common danger, so it is the result historically of causes for which the whole country is responsible, and that those portions of the land which have been free from the immediate presence of the institution to which we trace the evil are not without participation in the guilt as well as the lucre which appertained to it.

That everywhere the pharisee business is played out and the prayer of the publican is in order.

Tenth. Those parts of the country where there is least illiteracy have as a rule received already very largely pecuniary assistance from sources which originated in fortunate location and the wise providence of those who lived before them, and that there is justice in the request for help made by those whose ancestors acquired and defended the soil whereon these happy millions and glorious institutions now repose in prosperity and strength.

Eleventh. That there is no State or Territory in the Union where the facilities for common-school education should not be greatly increased, and none where twice the amount of expenditure and effort now going on might not profitably be made.

Twelfth. That local taxation is very heavy, falling chiefly upon homesteads and visible personal property and the estates of those least able to bear taxation, which should come from the surplus of society and not from its primary means of existence, while the national income is derived mainly from things either better not consumed at all, and therefore the more heavily taxed the better still, because there will be the less of that harm which comes from consumption, or from articles paid for by those who have the surplus earnings and accumulated wealth of society.

Thirteenth. That since, at the present time, the national taxation is far less burdensome to the masses of the people, upon whom falls much more heavily the weight of the support of State and local institutions, and also since the existence of the nation is as much imperiled by ignorance as the perpetuity of the States, therefore the common good requires the appropriation of national aid to the support and maintenance of common schools.

Fourteenth. That this aid should be distributed in such way and should so long continue as is necessary, in order to equalize the facilities for common-school education, and to once elevate the status of the masses of the community to a high standard of intelligence, at which point and after which the community would, in self-defense and from the instinct which inclines men to keep a good when they possess it, be sure to educate itself sufficiently without national help. This is proved: that systems of education are best supported and most firmly fixed in the most intelligent States. Those States would as soon surrender their liberties as their schools. They are synonymous.

I now pass to consider the ability of the different sections to bear taxation. The ability of communities to bear taxation is not in proportion to their relative total wealth or property. But there must first be deducted as properly exempt from any imposition so much property and producing power as is necessary to subsistence, and taxation can not be sustained except upon the surplus remaining, if any. The valuation per capita of the New England States is $661; of the Middle States, $473; of the Western States, $334; of the Territories, $211; of the Southern States, $155; of the colored population, not over $5; average of whole country, $337.

But the ability to bear taxation depends upon producing power at the time the levy is made as much as upon accumulated property, for property will not sell and consequently can not pay unless producing forces are active.

The census shows that from 1870 to 1880 in the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, and Tennessee, thirteen States, there was a net loss in valuation of $202,868,844. In Texas there was a gain of $170,631,586; in Georgia, $12,253,080; North Carolina, $25,721,580; total, $208,606,246. Consequently the total loss of valuation in the other ten States enumerated was the enormous sum of $411,475,090 in ten years.

Bear in mind these are not the ten years during which the slaves were liberated. These were the ten years between 1870 and 1880.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him if it is not possible that that difference or shrinkage of value in some of the Southern States is accounted for by the difference in the value of money in the census reports, being currency in 1870 and gold in 1880?

Mr. BLAIR. I can not say in regard to that. That is an open question upon which everybody can draw his own inference. But during the same time in the country at large, as the Senator knows, the aggregate valuation, which undoubtedly was made upon the same substantial basis in all parts of the country, very nearly doubled. It went from sixteen billion to thirty billion dollars or more, if I recollect aright. I will not vouch for figures, but I think it was from sixteen to thirty billion dollars, the actual values. The Senator will observe, too, that in three of the States enumerated there was an actual increase: in North Carolina of $25,000,000, in Texas of $170,000,000, and in Georgia of $12,000,000. I apprehend that the valuation is substantially on the same basis.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How do you account for it?

Mr. BLAIR. I account for it in the actual diminution in the cash value of the property in those States, if the figures are worth anything.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But how do you account for it?

Mr. BLAIR. From the general influences that operated in that section of the country. I think the data before the country very plainly show in most of these same States a quickening and revival in the business tendencies and in the business activity of the people and a general inclination to the investment of capital from abroad. The people are turning their attention to industrial questions, and very rapidly. The face of the South is being transformed, and the old poetic quotation will come in one of these days; the South will really bud and blossom as the rose, and that before a great while. But between the years 1870 and 1880 we all know the condition of the Southern country, and I do not think I could elucidate the subject in such a way that it would be better understood than the honorable Senator from Vermont and others already understand it.

The lack of education among the masses of the people is undoubtedly one more reason why property depreciated; perhaps the greatest reason was the absence of schools, and that was one cause why Northern immigration failed to find its home in the South rather than in the West. If there is anything that a Northern man or a Northern family wants, it is a chance to educate the children; it will not go where there are no schools. It is only primarily by the establishment of schools that that portion of the country can avail itself of the natural tendencies to immigration in that direction, either of individuals or of capital largely.

The decrease in the losing States varied from 45 to 78 per cent. I call attention to the thread of what I was saying, showing a decrease in the valuation in ten of those States of $411,000,000. During the same ten years the increase of population was 4,006,982, which is I suppose at least 30 per cent. of the population of the same thirteen States in 1870.

Ignorance and poverty procreate faster than intelligence and wealth.

Again, ability to bear taxation for a certain purpose will depend upon the other existing demands for the application of revenue. In a great section of our country the fixed capital, the houses, structures of all kinds for residence and business of every description, highways, and other means of transportation, &c., were lately destroyed by fire and sword, and when for that reason they have to be replaced or must be produced as a primary condition to existence and advancement for any reason, the taxation, such as poor and struggling communities can bear, must be greatly absorbed in these uses. A community has certain primary physical necessities like an individual, and as he must eat before he learns to read, so the community must provide for some things even before it provides completely for the intellectual culture of its children; hence it would be expected for all these causes that the people in the Southern States would be able to pay far less for the support of common schools than other portions of the American people. Yet, as a fact, they pay in proportion to their valuation as much and in proportion to their capacity to be taxed a great deal more for the education of their children. It is not a question of effort, but of strength.

The rate per cent. of school to total taxation is, in New England, 20.2 per cent.; Middle States, 19.5 per cent.; Western States, 26.6 per cent.; Territories, 22.4 per cent.; Southern States, 20.1 per cent.; average, whole country, 22.6 per cent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean on the total valuation?

Mr. BLAIR. No; the percentage of school taxation to the entire amount of taxation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To a fixed ratio.

Mr. BLAIR. Taking the entire taxation of the country and dividing that taxation into groups, the New England States, the Middle States, the Western States, the Territories, and the Southern States. In New England 20.2 per cent. of all taxation is given to education, to schools.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That percentage of the total for all purposes?

Mr. BLAIR. Of the amount of all taxes raised and collected. For instance, where there is $100,000 raised in any given community in New England, $20,200 of that $100,000 is applied to schools; in the Middle States, $19,500 of the $100,000 is applied to schools; in the Western States, $26,600 is applied to schools; in the Territories, $22,400 is applied to schools; in the Southern States, $20,100 is applied to schools; and the average for the whole country of every $100,000 of taxation is $22,600. It has a very important bearing on the merits of the proposition that this table be understood.

I now proceed to consider the increase of educational expenditures required. I have not dared to make these calculations up to what I think they really should be; they are the minimum. The education of children is a business just as much as the running of a government, or a line of transportation, or the raising of crops. A plant is first required. The child, ignorant of his letters, is the raw material; and in theory at least, the young man or woman instructed in the rudiments of knowledge and skilled in the primary arts for its acquisition is the manufactured article.

Falling back upon the returns of the Bureau of Education of 1881, the latest and most reliable we have, and bearing in mind all that I have said in the early part of my remarks of the increase since that time and the enlarged proportions of the problem we are dealing with, I ask attention to the following facts:

In 1881 there were children of the school ages in the United States not enrolled, that is, not attending at all anywhere in public or private schools, 6,030,936.

I will here state that educators complain everywhere that they lack accommodations for those who are actually enrolled. There are no school-houses for their accommodation. In fact there are not sittings for more than are enrolled anywhere. A school-house for fifty pupils can not cost less than $300. We have, then, a necessity for increase of school-houses 120,567, and of teachers at least the same number. The houses would cost $36,170,100; if you fit the teachers with one year of instruction, at $250, $30,141,850; teachers' wages for three-months' school, at $30, boarding themselves, about 50 cents per day—one-third pay of diggers of ditches and short drains—$10,854,930; cost of books, which must be paid for by some one, $180,782; total, $77,347,662, to provide the plant and run it three months for the instruction of the children not now attending school at all in this country.

Take now the seventeen Southern States, including the District of Columbia. There were not-enrolled children of school ages returned to the bureau in the year 1881, 2,873,399; school-houses and teachers required, 57,465; cost of houses at $300 each, $17,239,500; cost of fitting teachers, at $250 one year, $14,366,250; pay for three months, wages at $30 per month, teacher paying board, $5,172,750; school-books, $86,148—a total cost to provide for and instruct for three months the children not now enrolled in public or private schools $36,864,648, of which $31,692,898 is necessary before the schools could begin.

Now, all this done, in addition to what already exists north and south, the country would be only tolerably supplied with a school plant, the repair and reproduction of which, with constant increase of investment to perform properly the increasing educational work, must be provided for.

But it should be borne in mind that a school of three months leaves nine months in the year in which to forget what has been learned in the three. Many schools are far less in duration, and consist of but a single term during the year, some not more than three or four weeks, in fact. These averages are pernicious, inasmuch as it is like an effort to divide the crime or misery of the country according to population, and say that each person suffers 25 per cent. from cancer, or is three-fourths a lunatic, or 50 per cent. a murderer. But it is the best we can do, and in no event are we likely fully to grasp the tremendous significance of the solid facts. The schools in my opinion should be six months yearly, and be divided in two terms. That is enough; and the rest of the time of youth should be given to industrial improvement and recreation.

The actual yearly expenditures of all moneys for public schools in the whole country is at this time just about $80,000,000. I believe that to be a liberal estimate. Of this, in the sixteen Southern States, with the District of Columbia, there may be $14,000,000. In the year 1881 it was $13,359,784, as returned to the Commissioner of Education. The schools average about three months yearly.

If we deduct the $14,000,000 from $80,000,000 we have remaining as the expenditure in the rest of the country $66,000,000. As these Southern States have one-third the total population, in order to place that section upon an equality of privilege with the rest there should be, instead of $14,000,000, a yearly expenditure of $33,000,000 for her enrolled children, and none of these calculations make any provision for children not enrolled at all.

It is too low an estimate to say that in the North there should be an expenditure of $100,000,000 at once to increase school facilities, provide and qualify teachers for their work, and at least as much more in the South, or in the whole country, $200,000,000. Upon the present basis of expenditure in the North there would be $100,000,000 annually paid for the support of public schools in the whole country. If one-third the children are now unenrolled and unprovided for, there should be an increase in yearly expenditure of $50,000,000 on their account. This would make the annual cost of our public schools only $150,000,000, and would give to all the children of the whole country but six months' training each year, and to teachers only the pay of common laborers or less.

The proposition of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN]—setting aside the source of supply from which he proposed to get the money which would have a tendency to identify the support of the public schools with the prosperity of a business which I hope will yet disappear from the earth, which proposition was to appropriate about $80,000,000 yearly to schools—is really moderate when the necessities of the problem are fairly stated, and I take this occasion to say that the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, divested of the objectionable feature referred to, is worthy of a great statesman and far-seeing patriot. There is nothing the matter but our own failure to fully appreciate the stern requirements of the situation.

If fifty, eighty, or one hundred millions could be substituted for the fifteen millions proposed in this bill, and the whole distributed upon the basis of population, or of illiteracy, temporarily, it would be far better. But I have no hope of the adoption of such a measure, and the committee felt under the necessity of confining the amount to the comparative pittance of fifteen millions, which must necessarily, if not very largely increased, be confined to the dense clouds of ignorance where explosions are threatened; that is to say, it must be applied locally to the evil itself. In States which receive but little, comparatively little is wanted.

Even after $15,000,000 are divided upon the basis of illiteracy, the individual child will receive for his education in California, $15.12; in Colorado, $14.34; in Connecticut, $10.71; in Nevada, $14.40; in New Hampshire, $10.07; in Rhode Island, $11.36; in District of Columbia, $13.61, and in Massachusetts, $19.21.

While in Alabama he will receive $3.64; in Arkansas, $3.13; in Florida, $3.75; in Georgia, $4.03; in Kentucky. $3.67; in Louisiana, $4.96; in Mississippi, $4.09; in Virginia, $3.94; in West Virginia, $4.31; in North Carolina, $3.26; in South Carolina, $5.05.

While the immediate need in these last States is at least for double the education called for in the first group.

This bill appropriates $15,000,000 the first year, and will give to every State and Territory $3 for each person over ten years of age who can not read, and $2.41 for each person who can not write, lessening in amount, that is according to the basis of distribution, $1,000,000 yearly for ten years, when all payments are to cease.

The State will apply the funds and render a yearly account of the manner in which the work is done. The Executive, if dissatisfied, can withhold further expenditures, subject to the action of Congress.

Each State and Territory must expend for school purposes at least one-third the amount received during the first five years and an equal amount the second five years of the operation of the bill if it should become a law.

States receiving small amounts can expend the same for normal instruction, teachers' institutes, or otherwise, as they prefer. The amount that New Hampshire receives, for instance, would increase her normal school facilities more than threefold beyond the present expenditure of the State, or give 59 cents yearly to persons of school age.

The funds must be applied to schools and not to structures, not exceeding one-tenth to the qualification of teachers, which is the first necessity. The States are required to so use the fund as to bring about an actual equalization of school advantages to all children alike. Industrial education is provided for when practicable, which will be but seldom, although something may be done in suitable localities and in the way of beginning.

We are a great way deeper in the mire than we realize when we talk of doing much in the way of teaching trades and occupations before our children can half of them find a chance to learn to read. But it will come in time, and a beginning can now be made in the way of setting out a few young trees.

The Territories are of the utmost importance, and the bill undertakes to provide for them indispensable legislation, both in appropriations and administration.

The method of expenditure in the States is the same substantially which has already been adopted by the Senate in the passage of the bill establishing a national school fund from the proceeds of the sale of public lands, &c. As both parties have already indorsed that method of expenditure on more than one occasion, the committee, or at least a majority of its members, have thought best to avoid all chance for controversy on that subject by adopting that which, having been repeatedly sanctioned, can now be repudiated with consistency.

I also embrace this fitting opportunity to say that I fully believe that the States will everywhere disburse the moneys received under this bill, if it becomes a law, in good faith and with as sacred regard to the demands of prudence and honor in one section of the country as in the other. For a year or two there may be some possible confusion in setting up and testing machinery, but in the existing condition of the public mind the better way is to give outright to the States and hold them, as they desire to be held, to an undivided responsibility, to be redeemed upon their honor. We shall not trust to that honor in vain.

Mr. President, the absolute necessities of this nation of these States, of their darkened present and of the portentous future, demand the appropriation of public money from a full Treasury to aid in the establishment and support of common schools throughout the country.

Sir, I appeal to the facts, and entreat the Senate to pass this bill.

[Text of the bill (S. 398) as it passed the Senate April 7, 1884, by a vote of yeas 33, nays 11.

An act to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for eight years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit: The first year the sum of $7,000,000, the second year the sum of $10,000,000, the third year the sum of $15,000,000, the fourth year the sum of $13,000,000, the fifth year the sum of $11,000,000, the sixth year the sum of $9,000,000, the seventh year the sum of $7,000,000, the eighth year the sum of $5,000,000; which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

SEC. 2. That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of 10 years and over, can not write, bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; such computation shall be made according to the census of 1880.

SEC. 3. That no State or Territory shall receive any of the benefits of this act until the governor thereof shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, showing the character of the common-school system in force in such State or Territory; the amount of money expended therein during the last preceding school year in the support of common schools, not including expenditures for the rent, repair, or erection of school-houses; whether any discrimination is made in the raising or distributing of the common-school revenues or in the common-school facilities afforded between the white and colored children therein, and, so far as is practicable, the sources from which such revenues were derived; the manner in which the same were apportioned to the use of the common schools; the number of white and the number of colored common schools; the average attendance in each class and the length of the school term. No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that shall not have provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of race or color, either in the raising or distributing of school revenues or in the school facilities afforded: Provided, That separate schools for white and colored children shall not be considered a violation of this condition. The Secretary of the Interior shall thereupon certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the names of the States and Territories which he finds to be entitled to share in the benefits of this act, and also the amount due to each.

SEC. 4. That the amount so apportioned to each State and Territory shall be drawn from the Treasury by warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the monthly estimates and requisitions of the Secretary of the Interior, as the same may be needed, and shall be paid over to such officers as shall be authorized by the laws of the respective States and Territories to receive the same.

SEC. 5. That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws.

SEC. 6. The money appropriated and apportioned under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory shall be applied to the use of common and industrial schools therein by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 7. That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues or out of moneys raised under its authority in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

SEC. 8. That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to competent and suitable persons, of any color, who are without necessary means to qualify themselves for teaching, and who shall agree in writing to devote themselves exclusively, for at least one year after leaving such training-schools, to teach in the common schools for such compensation as may be paid other teachers therein.

SEC. 9. That no part of the educational fund allotted to any State or Territory shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same.

SEC. 10. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character, in the school districts of the several States and Territories, in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child, without distinction of race or color, an equal opportunity for education. The term "school district" shall include all cities, towns, parishes, and other territorial subdivisions for school purposes, and all corporations clothed by law with the power of maintaining common schools.

SEC. 11. That no second or subsequent allotment shall be made under this act to any State or Territory unless the governor of such State or Territory shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer under this act, and of the balance in the hands of such treasurer or officer withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid or unexpended, and also the amount expended in such State or Territory as required by section 3 of this act, and also of the number of public, common, and industrial schools, the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year, and in what branches instructed, the average daily attendance, and the relative number of white and colored children, and the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district. And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, and the other matters herein prescribed to be so reported, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made: Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified, it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein. If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, then the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute the next year's appropriation as is hereinbefore provided. The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

SEC. 12. That on or before the 1st day of September of each year the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the President of the United States whether any State or Territory has forfeited its right to receive its apportionment under this act, and how forfeited, and whether he has withheld such allotment on account of such forfeiture; and each State and Territory from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation, and briefly the condition of common and industrial education as affected thereby throughout the country, which report shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the report of his Department. And the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

SEC. 14. That no State or Territory that does not distribute the moneys raised for common school purposes equally for the education of all the children, without distinction of race or color, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this act.

Passed the Senate April 7, 1884.
Attest:

ANSON G. MCCOOK, Secretary.

[Text of the bill (S. 398) as reported to the Forty-eighth Congress.]

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for ten years after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit: The first year the sum of $15,000,000, the second year the sum of $14,000,000, the third year the sum of $13,000,000, and thereafter a sum diminished $1,000,000 yearly from the sum last appropriated until ten annual appropriations shall have been made, when all appropriations under this act shall cease; which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

SEC. 2. That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not read and write bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; and until otherwise provided such computation shall be made according to the official returns of the census of 1880.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior, at the close of each fiscal year, shall ascertain the total amount of the school fund to which the States and Territories and the District of Columbia are entitled under the provisions of this act, and shall certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before the 31st day of July of each year, apportion the said total sum so certified among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population and illiteracy specified in the second section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the amount so apportioned to each State and Territory and to the District of Columbia shall be paid, upon the warrant of the Commissioner of Education, countersigned by the Secretary of the Interior, out of the Treasury of the United States, to the treasurer of the State, Territory, or District, or to such officer as shall be designated by the laws of such State, Territory, or District to receive, account for, and pay over the same to the several school districts entitled thereto under said apportionment. The term "school district" as used in this section shall include cities, towns, parishes, or such other corporations as by law are clothed with the power of maintaining common schools: Provided, That such distribution or payment, after the receipt of said fund by the State, Territory, or District, may be made to any officer designated by the laws of the State, Territory, or District, for the disbursement of the school funds to the teachers employed in such schools.

SEC. 5. That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taugh tunder local laws, and shall include, whenever practicable, instruction in the arts of industry, and the instruction of females in such branches of technical or industrial education as are suited to their sex, which instruction shall be free to all, without distinction of race, color, nativity, or condition in life: Provided, That nothing herein shall deprive children of different races, living in the same community but attending separate schools, from receiving the benefits of this act the same as though the attendance therein were without distinction of race.

SEC. 6. The money appropriated and apportioned under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory shall be applied to the use of common and industrial schools therein by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 7. That the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of a Territory under the provisions of this act, but its existing laws and school authorities shall not be affected by the operation of this act. The Commissioner of Education shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment, and shall make full report of his doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 8. That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not, during the first five years of the operation of this act, annually expend for the maintenance of common schools at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof, and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole amount it shall be entitled to receive under this act.

SEC. 9. That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools, or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to competent and suitable persons, of any color, who are without necessary means to qualify themselves for teaching, and who shall agree in writing to devote themselves exclusively, for at least one year after leaving such training schools, to teach in the common schools, for such compensation as may be paid other teachers therein.

SEC. 10. That no part of the educational fund allotted to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same.

SEC. 11. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child an opportunity for common-school and, so far as may be, of industrial education; and to this end existing public schools, not sectarian in character, may be aided, and new ones may be established, as may be deemed best, in the several localities.

SEC. 12. That any State in which the number of persons 10 years of age and upward who can not read and write is not over 5 per cent. of the whole population thereof shall have the right to receive its allotment and to apply the same for the promotion of common-school and industrial education, or the education of teachers therein, in such a way as the Legislature of such State shall provide.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior shall receive from the governor of each State and Territory a report, to be made by or through such governor on or before the 30th day of June of each year, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer under section 4 of this act, and of the balance in the hands of such treasurer or officer withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid or unexpended, and also the amount expended in such State or Territory as required by section 8 of this act, and also of the number of public, common, and industrial schools, the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year and in what branches instructed, the average daily attendance, and the relative number of white and colored children, and the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district, and such other information in relation to the use of the school fund and the condition of common-school education as the Secretary of the Interior may require. And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made: Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein.

SEC. 14. That on or before the 1st day of September of each year the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the President of the United States whether any State or Territory or the District of Columbia has forfeited its right to receive its apportionment under this act, and how forfeited, and whether he has withheld such allotment on account of such forfeiture; and each State and Territory and the District of Columbia from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress; and if the next Congress shall not direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund for distribution among the other States and the Territories and District of Columbia which shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories and the District of Columbia, through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation, and briefly the condition of common and industrial education as affected thereby throughout the country, which report shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the report of his Department.

[Text of bill (S. 151) introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
December 6, 1881.

Mr. BLAIR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to bring in the following bill; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

December 20, 1881, ordered to be printed.

A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for ten years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit: The first year the sum of $15,000,000, the second year the sum of $14,000,000, the third year the sum of $13,000,000, and thereafter a sum diminished $1,000,000 yearly from the sum last appropriated until ten annual appropriations shall have been made, when all appropriations under this act shall cease; which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children living in the United States.

SEC. 2. That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws, and may include, whenever practicable, instruction in the arts of industry; which instruction shall be free to all, without distinction of race, nativity, or condition in life: Provided, That nothing herein shall deprive children of different races, living in the same community but attending separate schools, from receiving the benefits of this act the same as though the attendance therein were without distinction of race.

SEC. 3. That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not read and write bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; and until otherwise provided such computation shall be made according to the official returns of the census of 1880.

SEC. 4. That such moneys shall be expended in each State by the concurrent action, each having a negative upon the other, of the Secretary of the Interior, on the part of the United States, and of the superintendent of public schools, board of education, or other body in which the administration of the public-school laws shall be vested, on the part of the several States wherein the expenditures are respectively to be made; and whenever the authorities of the United States and of the State fail to agree as to the distribution, use, and application of the money hereby provided for, or any part thereof, payment thereof, or such part thereof, shall be suspended, and if such disagreement continue throughout the fiscal year for which the same was appropriated, it shall be covered into the Treasury and shall be added to the general appropriation for the next year, provided for in the first section of this act.

All sums of money appropriated under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory shall be applied to the use of schools therein by the Secretary of the Interior, through the commissioner of common schools, whose appointment is hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 5. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories in such way as to provide for the equalization of school privileges to all the children throughout the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child an opportunity for common-school education; and to this end existing public schools not sectarian in character may be aided, and new ones may be established, as may be deemed best in the several localities.

SEC. 6. That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to intelligent and suitable persons, of any color, who are without necessary means, and who shall agree, in writing, to qualify themselves and teach in the common schools of such State or Territory at least one year.

SEC. 7. That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school systems established by local power, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out in any State or Territory which shall not during the first five years of the operation of this act annually expend for the maintenance of common schools, free to all, at least one-third of the sum which shall be allotted to it under the provisions hereof, and during the second five years of its operation a sum at least equal to the whole it shall be entitled to receive under this act; and if such expenditure shall not be shown to the Secretary of the Interior at the end of each fiscal year by each State or Territory, respectively, or by such other evidence as shall be satisfactory to him, then the allotment under this act for each subsequent year so long as there shall be a deficiency of such expenditure by the State or Territory from the proceeds of local funds, whether derived from taxation or otherwise, shall be expended for the support of common schools therein wholly in the discretion of the Secretary, who shall apply the same to the support of existing or to the establishment of new schools in such way as he shall deem best.

SEC. 8. That no part of the money herein provided for shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school-buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same: Provided, however, That whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that otherwise any given locality will remain wholly without reasonable common-school advantages, he may, in his discretion, from the general fund allotted to the State or Territory, provide schools and for their temporary accommodations, by rent or otherwise, in the most economical manner possible: And provided further, That in no case shall more than 5 per cent. of such allotment be set apart for or be expended under the provisions of this section.

SEC. 9. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commissioner of common schools in each State and Territory, who shall be a citizen thereof and shall reside therein, and shall perform all such duties as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of the Interior, and who shall be specially charged with all the details of the execution of this act within his jurisdiction, and in co-operation with the State authorities. In the Territories he shall also be charged with the general supervision and control of public education, and shall possess all the powers now vested in Territorial superintendents and boards of education, or by whatever Territorial officers the same may have been hitherto exercised. He shall be paid a salary of not less than three nor more than five thousand dollars, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. He shall annually make full reports of all matters connected with schools in his jurisdiction to the Secretary of the Interior, and particular reports when called upon by the Secretary, and especially of all details in the administration of this act. In addition to his other duties he shall devote himself to the promotion of the general interests of public education in the State or Territory for which he is appointed.

SEC. 10. That any State, in which the number of persons ten years of age and upward who can not read is not over 5 per cent. of the whole population, signifying its desire that the amount allotted to it under the provisions of this act shall be appropriated in any other way for the promotion of common-school education, in its own borders or elsewhere, its allotment shall be paid to such State to be thus appropriated: Provided, That its Legislature shall have first considered the question of its appropriation to the general fund for use under the provisions of this act in States and Territories where the proportion of illiterate persons is more than 5 per cent. of the whole population.

SEC. 11. That any State whose illiterate is greater than 5 per cent. of its whole population failing to accept the provisions of this act and to comply with its provisions, so as to be entitled to its allotment from year to year, the sum allotted to such State, subject to the discretionary action of the Secretary of the Interior under the sixth and seventh sections of this act, shall become a part of the fund to be distributed among the States which shall be entitled to their respective allotments, and to the Territories. And any State not accepting the provisions of this act, nor acquiring the right to dispose of its allotment as provided in the preceding section, the same shall become a part of the general fund for like distribution.

SEC. 12. That the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of a Territory under the provisions of this act, but there shall be no commissioner of common schools appointed for said District, nor shall its existing laws and school authorities be interfered with. The Commissioner of Education shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment, and shall make full report of his doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this law through the Bureau of Education, and all moneys paid under its provisions shall be made by Treasury warrant to the individual performing the service to whom indebtedness shall be due, and who shall be personally entitled to receive the money, or to his agent, duly authorized by him, upon vouchers approved by the State authorities, when under the provisions of this act their approval is necessary, and by the commissioner of common schools for the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, and by the Secretary of the Interior.

I do not care further to trespass upon the time of the Senate now; and if the Senator from Virginia desires to ask that the bill be laid informally aside for the purpose of proceeding with the matters in his charge I shall not personally object; but, as I stated, I do not wish that this bill should lose its right of way.

Mr. MAHONE. I ask that this bill be laid aside informally and that we proceed with the public building bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE). The Senator from Virginia asks that the bill now under consideration be laid aside informally. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is laid aside. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of Senate bill No. 1255. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1255) to authorize the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices in San Francisco, Cal.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments. The first amendment was in section 2, after the word "chosen," in line 24, to insert:

Provided, That the site so selected shall be of such dimensions as to leave an open space of not less than 40 feet in width, including streets and alleys, around the building to be constructed thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 3, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to said site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of California shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

The bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the site on which the said building shall be erected shall be so selected as to leave an open space around the same of not less than 40 feet in width, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT STILLWATER, MINN.

The bill (S. 577) for the erection of a public building at Stillwater, Minn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

The bill (S. 263) providing for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mass., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a typographical error which ought to be corrected. The word "unexpose," in line 13, should be "unexposed." Without objection the correction will be made by the Secretary.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ATCHISON, KANS.

The bill (S. 1350) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the post-office and Government offices at the city of Atchison, Kans., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HOUSTON, TEX.

The bill (S. 93) authorizing the construction of a public building for a post-office in the city of Houston, Tex., was announced.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. When was that bill reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it was reported this morning.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then, sir, it is not in order, and I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia objects to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MAHONE. Why is it not in order, Mr. President? It has gone to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole proceeding is by unanimous consent.

MONEY FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object. Now, sir, I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution, which I suppose will be objected to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be requested to report to the Senate the aggregate amount of money proposed to be appropriated by the bills reported from that committee up to and including this day; also the number of buildings and the cost of each, and the States in which they are to be located; also the population of the cities or towns in which such buildings are to be erected, and the purpose for which each building is to be used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] asks unanimous consent to present a resolution at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire its present consideration?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish the regular order to be displaced. It may be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire objects.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the motion?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. This is a resolution inquiring only as to the amount of money that is covered by these bills presented here to-day, in what States the proposed buildings are located, what the cost of each building is to be, and for what purpose each building is to be used. That is the only purpose of the resolution. The Senator from New Hampshire will let me say that if I am interfering in any way with his educational bill I am entirely willing to let this go over, for I feel a much more representative interest in the educational bill than I do in these public building bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This proceeding is out of order. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLAIR. I object, for the purpose of saying——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire objects, and the resolution will go over under the rule.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] is proceeding with the public building bills.

Mr. CAMERON. The further consideration of those bills was objected to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presiding officer understands that that order is completed so far as it can be done under the objection made. The Chair will state that in the case of a bill reported to-day, if a single objection is made the bill must go over until to-morrow.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I will say once more, that having ascertained what the sense of the Senate is, that it is to pass all these bills for the appropriation of public money for public buildings, I shall withdraw my objection, but only with the understanding that I still protest against it. After they are disposed of I shall ask for the passage of my resolution, but I will even let the resolution lie upon the table, if necessary, in order to pass the educational bill in charge of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TELLER rose.

Mr. BLAIR. Do I understand that the Senator from Colorado wishes to make a motion?

Mr. TELLER. No; I do not desire to interfere if the present order can be continued. I do not want to interfere until that is through.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that the educational bill is still further laid aside informally to allow the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] to proceed with the public building bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing now pending before the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I withdraw my objection to the further consideration of the bill for a public building at Houston.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 93) authorizing the construction of a public building for a post-office in the city of Houston, Tex. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. It being the understanding that the educational bill is informally laid aside for the consideration of these bills, I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the position. The educational bill is informally laid aside. There being no objection, the bill named will be proceeded with.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HOUSTON, TEX.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 93) authorizing the construction of a public building for a post-office in the city of Houston, Texas.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 4, to strike out the word "purchase" and insert "acquire by purchase or condemnation;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase or condemnation a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LANCASTER, PA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1163) for a public building at Lancaster, Pa.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 16, after the words "one hundred," to strike out the words "and seventy-five;" so as to read:

The plans and estimates for said building having first been prepared, examined, and approved, as required in section 3731 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and based upon calculations and specifications that will insure the completion of the building and the purchase of the ground at a cost not to exceed the sum of $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PAWTUCKET, R. I.

The bill (S. 954) for the erection of a public building in the city of Pawtucket, R. I., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 16, to fill the blank before "thousand" by inserting the word "seventy-five;" so as to read:

And for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT SCOTT, KANS.

The bill (S. 1386) for the completion of a public building at Fort Scott, Kans., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WICHITA, KANS.

The bill (S. 1387) for the completion of a public building at Wichita, Kans., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWPORT, KY.

The bill (S. 538) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Newport, Ky., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEATH OF GENERAL WINFIELD S. HANCOCK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the liberty of communicating this telegram to the Senate:

NEW YORK, February 9.

General Hancock has just died.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OPELOUSAS, LA.

The bill (S. 324) for the erection of a public building at Opelousas, La., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HUDSON, N. Y.

The bill (S. 637) for the erection of a building at Hudson, N. Y., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4, to strike out the word "purchase" and insert the words "acquire by purchase or condemnation;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire by purchase or condemnation a suitable site for, and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious public building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the use and accommodation of the post-office and internal-revenue offices, and for other Government uses, at the city of Hudson, in the State of New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

The site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLORADO SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. TELLER. I ask to call up Senate bill 884.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 884) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections within Indian reservations. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. That is to be considered with the same understanding that has prevailed in regard to the public building bills?

Mr. LOGAN and others. Oh, yes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to construe an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875, as giving to the State of Colorado the right to select for school purposes other lands in lieu of such sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be within any Indian reservation in the State of Colorado.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 11, after the word "lands," to insert "in the State of Colorado;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That such selections shall be made from lands in the State of Colorado returned as agricultural, and upon which, at the date of selection, no settlement has been made, and to which rights under the settlement laws shall not have attached; such selection to be made as near as may be as selections are made under the acts of July 2, 1864, and July 23, 1866, for the selection of agricultural college lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CALL. I should be glad to have the Senator from Colorado state just what the bill is.

Mr. TELLER. It is to enable Colorado to take for school purposes land in lieu of land that was lost by the fact that it was set apart for Indian reservations. It is in accordance with the practice of Congress in regard to other States. The bill has once passed the Senate substantially as now framed.

Mr. CALL. All right.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 1302.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 1302) authorizing the appointment of an assistant Secretary of the Navy and fixing the salary of the same, and for other purposes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAIR. With the same understanding with reference to the regular order?

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. It is understood that it does not displace the educational bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that to have been laid aside informally in each case.

Mr. BLAIR. But I understand that consent strictly extends only to the order of business which displaces it informally, and when a new order of business is called to the attention of the Senate, unless the request is made in proper form, I conceive that the understanding is that the regular order is displaced. If Senators would make their requests in proper form I should not be obliged to get on my feet each time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the Chair will hold that the first consent to lay the educational bill aside informally attaches to each of the bills operating under that consent.

Mr. HARRIS. Was it not the announcement of the Chair that by unanimous consent the educational bill was laid aside informally until to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought that had been the announcement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I shall understand, and act on the understanding, that the presiding officer holds that the educational bill is laid aside informally for the consideration of each of these measures as moved, and it is no longer necessary for me to trouble the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks, is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the measure known as the bill providing for an assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. INGALLS. If that bill is to be taken up for purposes of discussion merely, I have no objection; but it is of sufficient importance I think to have its own place, and I should be unwilling to have it taken up by unanimous consent with the understanding that it is now to be pressed to a vote.

Mr. CAMERON. I thought the bill had been pretty thoroughly discussed two or three days ago.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, no; the vestibule has not been entered.

Mr. CAMERON. Then we might as well begin now and enter the vestibule.

Mr. INGALLS. That depends on the Senator from New Hampshire. If he is willing to have debate proceed on this bill, I have no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not desire to press the educational bill until to-morrow, but at the same time I would do so rather than that it should be displaced as the regular order. I consent to nothing but to its being laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. LOGAN rose.

Mr. CALL. I was going to ask unanimous consent that the resolution introduced by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] yesterday might be taken up for consideration now, but I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. LOGAN. What I intended was to give notice that I should offer an amendment to the bill in charge of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to present the amendment now, with a letter of the Secretary of War, so that if the bill goes over it may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the bill (S. 1302) authorizing the appointment of an assistant Secretary of the Navy and fixing the salary of the same, and for other purposes, and asks that the amendment be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. PLUMB. Does it require unanimous consent to have the bill in the charge of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] laid aside informally?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. PLUMB. Will not the Senator from New Hampshire, rather than obstruct legislation, move that his bill be postponed until to-morrow and be the special order at 2 o'clock?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to make any disposition of the educational bill except that which is so easily made, that it be laid aside informally for each one of these measures, and which, if Senators saw fit to put the request in that form, would avoid all possibility of difficulty, asking that the regular order be laid aside informally in order to take up a certain bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I apprehend if the Senator from New Hampshire would ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to informally lay aside his bill until 2 o'clock to-morrow that that consent could be obtained, and then a majority of the Senate could decide on what it would consider this evening. But unless he takes such course nothing can be considered this evening except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to state for the information of the Senate that the bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, which is always passed by the Senate as a matter of course, being the bill for the Southern claims, but is a long bill and will take a good while to read it, is ready for passage on the Calendar, and, if it is convenient to the Senate, that might perhaps be done at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that bill has not yet been returned from the Printer.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; then it is not ready to be proceeded with.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the bill the Senator from New Hampshire has charge of be informally laid aside.

Mr. HARRIS. That motion is not in order.

Mr. BLAIR. In order not to obstruct legislative business any further this afternoon, I will ask unanimous consent that the school bill now informally laid aside be the unfinished business at 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill known as the educational bill shall be the unfinished business at 2 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be entered as the unfinished business for 2 o'clock to-morrow.

FORFEITURE OF IOWA LAND GRANT.

Mr. PLUMB. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 149) forfeiting a part of certain lands granted to the State of Iowa to aid in construction of railroads in that State, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to appeal to my honorable friend from Kansas not to call up that bill. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] is absent.

Mr. PLUMB. If it should come up and the Senator from Minnesota should be absent I shall have no objection to stating what I have to say about it and then have it laid aside before action. It is not necessary that the Senator from Minnesota should be present when I make my remarks.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not interpose in regard to that. Some constituents of mine have a deep interest in the bill, and I do not desire to have it taken up out of order, but if the Senator desires to address the Senate upon it——

Mr. PLUMB. No, sir; I do not. As far as this question of order is concerned, permit me to say that this bill was reached on the call of the Calendar under what is known as the Anthony rule, and was objected to and went over. It is very convenient for the Senator from Massachusetts to say, "We do not want it called up out of its order," because if we keep adding to the Calender from day to day that bill gets further out of the line every day, and consequently will never be reached during this session of the Senate or the next one or at any other session in its order. It will have to be taken up in this way.

The Senator from Massachusetts has a certain view about this matter which is opposed to the one which I have, but I take it he will admit that it is a matter of public interest and that it is one of those questions which have got to be subjected to some debate, and that neither his friends nor the settlers whom I represent here, because I happen to have reported the bill, are to be advantaged by delay. It is one of those bills which ought in the very nature of things to come up at an early day, and he can not expect to gain any advantage, unless he intends to wear the life out of somebody—I know he does not—by putting the bill over from time to time.

I think there ought to be some concession to a bill of this importance, that it shall come up. It is the habit of the Senate to take up those bills which are of a private character, which are not of a general public character, to the exclusion of bills of this kind, which are of a public character, and which concern, as this bill does, a very large number of people in a very important way.

I am not tenacious about the bill coming up at this moment; but as I see that it is getting further and further away from the time that it can be considered in its order, if it is ever to be considered at all in that way, I feel bound to press it for consideration. The Senator from Massachusetts is just as capable of arguing the question, I have no doubt, now as ever, and he must admit with me, as I said before, that it is one of those questions which must be argued, a question which must be decided some time by the legislative branch of the Government in order that any benefit may result to the people whom he represents or to the settlers. Therefore, if it is not to be heard now, I will yield to any reasonable suggestion as to the time when it shall be heard.

Mr. HOAR. In using the phrase that this bill ought not to come up out of its order, I did not mean to be understood that it ought not to be taken up on a special motion as a bill in its place on the Calendar it would have to be. The last thing I had in mind was to suggest anything affecting the bill by any delay; but it is a bill which the Senator from Minnesota knows all about; at any rate he has thoroughly investigated it and he has a very earnest belief that it would be unjust to persons, that it would deprive persons of substantial rights. I am not myself so familiar with the bill as he is, but I was spoken to about it last year by a constituent of mine who was vouched for as a gentleman of high character and standing, and on his statement it certainly was an invasion of right.

Now, the Senator from Minnesota is absent from his seat, and I suppose he is probably unwell, for he was exceedingly hoarse yesterday and could hardly speak with comfort to himself or to anybody else, and he is the person who would bear the brunt of the debate. I should very likely not have occasion to say anything; that is, my remarks would be very brief; and it is not now the time which the Senate usually devotes to such things. Here is a bill on the Calendar, a long bill, which will take two or three days, which for some reason that I do not understand has been passed by for the moment. It seems to me that it would be very unusual, that it would be unjust to any single Senator, to take this time for bringing up that measure. I do not think any Senator, I do not think my friend from Kansas himself on reflection, would think that it is just or proper to ask that the bill should be taken up at this extraordinary time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate is proceeding out of order entirely.

Mr. PLUMB. I made a motion which I think is debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. A motion to take up a bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the debate is in order if we by unanimous consent have it and nobody objects.

Mr. SPOONER. If I may be permitted, I should be glad to say a word on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not opposed to the bill in its main features, but I happen to know that gentlemen who deem themselves vitally interested in it and who consider their interests attacked by the bill are constituents of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN]. He feels a great interest in the bill, and desires not only to offer some amendments to it, but to be heard generally upon its merits. He sent word to me this morning that he is ill; that he is unable to leave his room. I think he would not like to have the main argument in support of the bill submitted by the Senator from Kansas without his presence. I think he would desire to hear the entire debate, and I submit it is only fair deference to a Senator situated as he is, interested in the measure and unable to be here, that the Senator from Kansas should forbear to press it at this time.

Mr. PLUMB. That is the first statement which has been made that even contained a suggestion that the Senator from Minnesota was not in the Capitol.

Mr. SPOONER. He is ill and not able to be here.

Mr. PLUMB. I had not heard that at all. I had just sent for him to his committee-room, where I supposed he was.

Mr. HOAR. I stated that he was hoarse and unable to speak, except with great difficulty, yesterday.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not hear the Senator make that statement.

Mr. HOAR. I will state to my friend from Kansas that yesterday at the meeting of the Judiciary Committee the Senator from Minnesota was acting chairman, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] being absent, and he was unable even to sit at the head of the table and put questions to the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. I supposed the Senator from Minnesota was in the Capitol. I had not observed his absence, and do not desire to press the measure under the circumstances.

Mr. SPOONER. He requested that a pair should be obtained for him, as he was unable to leave his room and could not speak above a whisper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas withdraw his motion?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] desires to submit a remark or two on the question.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will hear what the Senator from Virginia has to say.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I offered a resolution, which is at the desk, without objection. It is simply a resolution calling for information. There was no objection made to it, and therefore it was proper to have it immediately considered. It directs the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report the aggregate amount of money involved in the public building bills which have been reported here. The Senator from New Hampshire said that he wanted to have the educational bill presented to-day, and I would not interpose any obstacle in the way of that bill; but I think it is now proper that the Senate shall conclude whether it will adopt that resolution of mine, as there was no objection at the time it was offered. It is simply a resolution calling for information from the committee, and I take it for granted that there will be no objection to the passage of it, as there was none to its consideration at the time it was offered. I ask the Senator from Iowa to just allow that resolution to be propounded again. It is in order, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I did not expect under the circumstances that the Senate would proceed to the consideration of the bill involved in the motion made by the Senator from Kansas, but I should like to have some understanding with reference to the consideration of that bill. In view of the statement made relative to the physical condition of the Senator from Minnesota, of course I would not ask the Senate to proceed now to consider it, and even if unanimous consent had been given and the bill were pending before the Senate, under that statement I should consent to its going over until he could be present.

But the bill is one of very great importance to a large number of people in the State of Iowa. It involves not merely a private question, but one of very great public significance. I, therefore, would desire to have a time fixed for the consideration of that bill. If by consent the bill could be taken up for consideration, say at 2 o'clock on Thursday, I should be quite content with that arrangement; but it is important, both with reference to the personal rights involved and the public questions complicated in the case that there should be an early hearing, in order that the action of the Senate, if it should be favorable, may be communicated to the other House in time for its action upon the bill during the present session. I suggest, therefore, that by unanimous consent the bill may be set for hearing at 2 o'clock on Thursday. If at that time, I may state, the Senator from Minnesota should still be absent on account of sickness, understanding the interest he feels in the measure, I should not urge its consideration then.

Mr. BLAIR. I must object to any arrangement that might interfere with the educational bill, which very likely will not be disposed of by Thursday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then, if objection is made to that, I give notice that a motion will be made at the first convenient opportunity to proceed with the consideration of that bill.

Mr. TELLER rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What does the Senator from Kansas desire touching the matter?

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas withdraws the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him at this time.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to take up Senate bill No. 1092. It is a bill——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Pending that motion I am obliged to insist that the resolution which was sent to the desk by me, and which was received without objection, shall be voted upon. It is a resolution calling for information from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It went to the desk without opposition, and I yielded——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to suggest to him that under the rules all resolutions lie over one day unless considered by unanimous consent?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It was brought before the Senate by unanimous consent. That is exactly what was done.

Mr. HARRIS. If I understand the Senator's statement, it is that his resolution was sent to the desk without objection. Then, if he asked unanimous consent for its consideration and that consent was given, I can not imagine any reason why it was not considered at that time.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It was not considered for only the one reason, that the Senator from New Hampshire asked that he might make a motion or a suggestion regarding his educational bill, and I said I would not allow the resolution to be an obstacle, but that as soon as the suggestion or motion was disposed of I should call it up again. The resolution is now before the Senate by unanimous consent. It is a simple resolution asking for information, and it does seem to me that I should be entitled to that consideration here in view of the fact that I offered a resolution a few days ago, accepted notice of the disposition to be made of it, and subsequently it was disposed of in some other way, and yesterday the same resolution was discussed on a proposition of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], when the whole resolution that I had offered was ruled out of order by the presiding officer, who himself discussed it yesterday when it was not relevant, and when the subject was not appropriately before the Senate. I do think that I have a right to ask that this be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presiding officer is obliged to inform the Senator from Virginia that objection was made to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him, and that it has gone over under the rules, and is not before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I am very much surprised, for at the very time that it was offered no audible objection was made, and I myself rose and deferred to the Senator from New Hampshire. Where did the audible objection come from, and who is the Senator who made the objection? No, sir, let it go.

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to take up for consideration Senate bill 1092. It is a bill for the purpose simply of carrying out a provision of the Revised Statutes, which will be found in section 2339, providing the right of way for ditches and canals over the public lands. In that act there was no provision made for the filing of maps, and this is for making provision for the filing of maps. I ask that the bill may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1092) to grant the right of way through the public lands for irrigation purposes may be taken up for present consideration.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read in full for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HOAR. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1176) to provide for the distribution of public documents among the depositaries of public documents. I wish to say, if I may have unanimous consent, before the motion is put——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. Do you object to what I say?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No, sir; not to what you say, but I object to taking up the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I did not ask your consent to take up the bill. I ask consent to make the explanation that there are very few public documents which do not now go to the general depositaries of public documents. The bill simply provides for adding those few to those that go.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to take up the bill (S. 1176) to provide for the distribution of public documents among the depositaries of public documents.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the Public Printer shall deliver to the Interior Department a sufficient number of copies of every Government publication printed at the Government Printing Office (including the publications of all bureaus and offices of the Government) to enable the Department to supply a copy to every depositary of public documents designated according to law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should be glad to have the Senator explain whether that is to add to the number of volumes that are to be printed. Where is the supply to come from? I should like to have the bill under the consideration of the Committee on Printing for consultation with the Public Printer.

Mr. HOAR. The bill was reported to the Committee on the Library as a substitute for another bill sent there much more extensive in its scope. This bill only provides that the distribution shall be made to one depositary of public documents, as I understand, named by each member of the House of Representatives and each Senator; that is, the number of such depositaries existing in the country is the number of Senators and Representatives added together, and they are each authorized to designate a public library where public documents shall be sent. Nearly all the documents go there now, except the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and one or two others; and this proposes to add to the number copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and also the documents published by the authority of the several Departments, which will make of course the necessity for printing an additional number, but it will be a very small cost, because it is only the press-work and the paper that it costs, and these depositaries of public documents are rendered almost absolutely worthless unless they are complete. If a person wishes to study a public question, the editor of a paper, a person who is informing himself on such matters, or a person who is debating them before the people, if there are half a dozen out of the public documents not found there his study is incomplete. It is very important that this information should be accessible in some few places in every State in the Union. The more remote from the center the more important the depositary is.

Mr. PLUMB. This bill certainly should not pass as it is now, because at least one public document is in process of distribution, and the effect of this proposed act would be to break the set of that document. I refer to the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion.

Mr. HOAR. No, it does not break the set at all.

Mr. PLUMB. A certain number of copies are now provided for and being printed by law, and if some of those copies are to be taken for the purpose of complying with this measure, if it shall become a law, then somebody has got to be diminished of the number of copies they are getting, and consequently the number of sets now being distributed of that work must be broken up.

Mr. HOAR. The Printer will——

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. PLUMB. I object to doing a thing in that kind of a way. It would certainly be a blind statute to say the best, and I think it ought to go to the Committee on Printing. I have no doubt there are a great many other public documents which would be affected in the same manner, and if it is designed to increase the number only of the new volumes, then it would be an absolute waste of public money, because more than fifteen volumes of that work have already been printed, and all the succeeding volumes so distributed would be absolutely worthless without the first volumes.

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend from Kansas allow me——

Mr. PLUMB. No, sir.

Mr. HOAR. To answer that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not.

Mr. HOAR. I never refused to yield to a Senator in my life.

Mr. PLUMB. I say that to carry out this proposed law literally would render valueless the documents which it would provide for printing if the construction is put upon it which the Senator from Massachusetts says it will bear; that is to say, that the Public Printer shall print an additional number of the sixty-five and odd volumes of the official history of the rebellion that are yet to be issued. If he merely prints enough copies of those volumes to comply with this measure, then those volumes would be absolutely valueless by reason of the fact that the fifteen or twenty preceding volumes could not be distributed in the same way, because there are none to be distributed. I think the proper thing to do with this bill would be to commit it to the Committee on Printing, so that when it comes before the Senate again we may be fully advised as to its effect and so that it may be guarded upon all disputed points.

Mr. HOAR. The trouble with the argument of the most amiable and delightful Senator from Kansas is that the document to which he refers goes to these depositaries now and is not in the least affected by the bill. The only document left out at present that I know of of any importance is the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That, under the construction given by the Public Printer, is not included as a document printed according to law now. That is the only important document that this bill requires to have an additional number of copies made of. Then in addition to that are the documents printed by the Departments for their own use.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to make a suggestion in reference to these war records, merely to inquire whether this bill will conflict with the law already existing. I think now about seventeen volumes have been completed and the total will be about eighty volumes, I am told, when completed. The law authorizing the printing of those War Records requires each Senator and Representative in Congress to give the names of the different institutions and individuals to whom they are to be sent, and they are sent from the War Department by the Secretary of War to such persons and institutions. Will the Senator from Massachusetts tell me whether this conflicts with that?

Mr. HOAR. It does not affect that in the least. Under the existing law, let me repeat, these depositaries of public documents are already supplied with nearly all the public documents printed by authority of Congress, and a copy for each depositary is sent of the Rebellion Record, as it is called. They have now these copies of the Rebellion Record sent to these places. Then, in addition to that, Senators and Representatives furnish their lists of so many persons or libraries to whom they wish them sent. That is not affected. The only effect of this bill is, as I said, to cover the case of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the documents printed by the Departments for their own use.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, during the Forty-eighth Congress I introduced a bill upon this subject which was referred to the Committee on the Library and reported favorably by that committee and it passed the Senate and went to the House, but was not acted on by that body. That bill provided for the distribution to designated depositaries of two Government publications, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Laws of Congress, two of the most important of the documents published by the Government for the general use and information of the people. I again introduced that bill during the present session, and it was referred to the Committee on the Library, and this bill is the result. Now I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the only publication which this provides for that is not provided for by the law as it now exists except the Department publications is the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. I should have added the Laws of the United States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well, then, if that is included this bill would cover——

Mr. HOAR. This bill is intended to cover in a different form of expression just what the Senate passed on the motion of my honorable friend from Iowa last winter, except that it adds, as I stated, the Department publications.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts how the Public Printer can deliver these documents unless he has authority to print them. A certain number of copies are printed annually, and in each authority to print is a method of distribution provided. It seems to me that if this bill shall pass there must also be an appropriation to direct the Public Printer to print these copies.

Mr. HOAR. You will have to provide for additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and of the Laws of the United States when you come to make the appropriations for printing. There will be 400 copies more of them printed by the Government Printer and delivered; but the Department publications, of course, do not require any further provision for.

Mr. ALLISON. This is the place, it seems to me, to provide for the printing of these documents. The Public Printer's appropriation is limited; and it seems to me that if an additional number of copies of any particular document is to be printed there should be a provision of law authorizing it. The Departments order a certain amount of public printing that they are authorized to have done, but they are not authorized to print extra copies of Department documents.

Mr. HOAR. There is to be no printing in which the additional expense of any public document would be more than a few cents or a few dollars. Take the Laws of the United States and the RECORD. Of course the extra copies of these would cost something. When the Committee on Appropriations makes its appropriations to the Government Printer for printing the RECORD, it will undoubtedly take cognizance of the fact that a law has passed, if it does pass at this session, which will require the Government Printer to print 400, or whatever the number is, additional copies of the RECORD and of the Public Laws. It seemed to us that is the place, and not this, for the appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there will be a difficulty that will arise in regard to the printing unless some further provision is made here.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to call for the regular order.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is the regular order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That is the difference between us. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS. This bill was taken up by a vote of the Senate, I believe, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor on the bill now pending.

Mr. HAWLEY. Whether this bill be referred to the Committee on Printing or not, of which committee I have the honor to be a member, I should like it better if it could lie over until there may be some investigation. We are without information on the subject. For example, I can not myself now from memory—I have heard these things in the Committee on Printing, but I can not from remembrance say what publications will go to these depositaries.

Mr. HOAR. All publications authorized by authority of Congress. I have no objection to the suggestion of my friend. His committee has reported this bill once.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think in this form.

Mr. HOAR. At the last session.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know precisely what classes of publications go to these depositaries. If there is one depositary in each Congressional district, there are three hundred and twenty-five.

Mr. FRYE. And two for Senators.

Mr. HAWLEY. Making, say, four hundred and seventy-five depositaries.

Mr. HOAR. One for each Senator.

Mr. HAWLEY. Four hundred and one depositaries, then. Now, the Senator from Massachusetts says that every publication goes there already. I beg his pardon. "Publication" is a very general term. The letter of this bill requires the sending there of a copy of every single bill that is printed by Congress, for that is a publication and a little volume of itself. I take my pencil, and my impression is that it will take 50,000 octavo volumes bound, and probably 75,000 octavo volumes, to supply that alone. It supplies every little publication that is auxiliary and subsidiary to the work of the two Houses of Congress, every executive document, every report of a committee, and, more than that, every single publication of the different bureaus and offices of the Government, not alone the Patent Office Gazette, but every pamphlet of instruction, perhaps, to every postmaster and register of land office, and so on. All these publications under the letter of this bill must be gathered up and sent to these depositaries, and these things do not come to the Senate, a great majority of them; they are of no mortal use to us except to a committee specially charged with investigating some special topic.

The bill is too indefinite. I would not pretend to say what expenditure is involved in it; I think it must be enormous. Gentlemen do not stop to think what these things amount to. Four hundred and one copies of all publications is an enormous quantity. We are spending over $3,000,000 a year in the Printing Office now; it is the largest printing office in the world, and this is the most extravagant Government by all odds that ever was heard of. There is nothing like it in the matter of printing. We print, I will not say how many miles of Agricultural Reports, loaded on the shelves, but miles upon miles of them; and here is a bill in support of which nobody has a statement of what has already been done nor an estimate of what the measure will cost.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, the distribution of documents to libraries——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to a point of order, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia rises to a point of order. He will state the point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I find, sir, under Rule VII, clause 2—

Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the Calendar shall be entertained by the presiding officer, unless by unanimous consent; and if such consent be given the motion shall not be subject to amendment, and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up.

That is, up to 1 o'clock. Now if there is any rule changing that after any other hour I fail to find it in this publication of our rules. My object is to proceed to the regular order of business, and I can not ascertain where there is any rule changing this one even after 1 o'clock, unless it shall be by a two-thirds vote. No rule of the Senate can be changed except by a two-thirds vote; and to take up any bill out of its order is changing a rule. I therefore again call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is proceeding under Rule IX in regular order, and this bill has been taken up on motion by a majority of the Senate and is pending.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senate is proceeding under Rule IX of this pamphlet?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule IX of the rules and the second paragraph of that rule?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir.

Immediately after the consideration of cases not objected to upon the Calendar—is completed, and not later than 2 o'clock, if there be no special order for that time—

I objected—

And there is none—

the Calendar of General Orders shall be taken up and proceeded with in its order—

We all know what a calendar means and what "Calendar of General Orders" is—beginning with the first subject on the Calendar next after the last subject disposed of in proceeding with the Calendar; and in such case the following motions shall be in order at any time as privileged motions, save as against a motion to adjourn, or to proceed to the consideration of the executive business, or questions of privilege, to wit:

First. A motion to proceed to the consideration of an appropriation or revenue bill.

Second. A motion to proceed to the consideration of any other bill on the Calendar, which shall not be open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is upon that clause——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Hear the words:

which shall not be open to amendment—

Is not this bill open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to proceed to its consideration is not open to amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; but it is not debatable until that is passed upon.

Third. A motion to pass over the pending subject, which, if carried, shall have the effect to leave such subject without prejudice in its place on the Calendar.

Fourth. A motion to place such subject at the foot of the Calendar.

Now, sir, this is either debatable or it is not. I claim that if you can take up this subject at all, you must take it up by a two-thirds vote and without debate. I understand this bill to be on the Calendar. Am I misinformed about that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is on the Calendar.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then a two-thirds vote only can take it up, and it must be taken up first without debate, and it must not be open to amendment, otherwise a single objection carries it over under the very rule that the presiding officer now refers me to. It must not be open to amendment, and I do, therefore, interpose my objection, and I do it for the reason that the Senate of the United States ought to have one code of rules governing every man in it. I have found here one practice, as it is called in the West, governing one class of Senators, and another code of rules governing another. I make my point of order now, that this book alone is the code by which the Senate is to be governed. I care not for the gavel, unless the gavel raps for the rules. I care not for any man's age in the Senate, or the State from which any man comes. I care not whether you introduce bills here to construct public buildings and take $5,000,000 out of the public Treasury in a day and rule me out of order, forsooth, because I mean only to protest against it; but I do assert my rights under that only which can and shall control me in this body, and that is the rules of the Senate. I have not appealed, but I have risen to this point of order. I do not want one rule for one man and another rule for another. I want the rules to be enforced and the gavel to announce every time when a motion is out of order. I have only asked that.

I have been told here within the last five days that I was out of order in asking the Senate to consider a resolution and speak to it which was subsequently referred to a committee and buried there, and yet which yesterday was discussed without limit or relevancy. I have been told to-day that the resolution that I offered and which I understood to be before the Senate by unanimous consent and which I deferred only to the Senator from New Hampshire that he might not have his educational bill obstructed by it was objected to; and yet there was no audible objection. I am now told that there is another subject before the Senate. I should like to know how it got here, under what rule it is being considered, and under what rule the President of the Senate can hear the debate on it.

Sir, I mean to maintain only the rights that I have under the rules of the Senate, and I do mean to hold that every Senator on this floor shall be governed as rigidly as I have been by the rules twice within a week. These rules shall obtain as long as I have a voice to utter what is in the rules with my experience of the last week.

I now call for the regular order, and I say that this motion being here before the Senate under this rule, which says it shall not be open to amendment or if open to amendment it can not come up except by unanimous consent, it is improperly here, and it ought to go by and the regular order ought to be considered.

If I am too pronounced in this matter I know it will be understood that I have had some little provocation for it. I renew my claim and I call the attention of the Chair to it. I know that the President of the Senate is fair and honest in his rulings on these matters; but he may, like myself and like a great many other people in the world, not know everything, and can sometimes be informed by having the attention called to some matter.

This rule provides that this proposition could have been taken up or any other similarly situated proposition or bill on the Calendar by the vote of the Senate, but it is only when the bill is not subject to amendment. I submit now that this bill is not properly before the Senate; it is in violation of the rules to consider it; and I again, in conclusion of what I have to say in raising my point of order, ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from Virginia. This bill was regularly taken up under the ninth rule, there being no unfinished business and no special order and the Calendar being in order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. May I ask the Chair if the bill is open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In a moment, after the Chair has announced his decision.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. May I ask the Chair if the bill is open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to interrupt the Chair while announcing his opinion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I thought the Chair was through. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of the present occupant of the Chair this bill was taken up in regular order on motion from the Calendar under the second clause of the ninth rule, and is now in order. On that question the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has the floor. The Chair will further state in making the announcement that a point of order can only be taken and made; how far Senators may debate the point of order until the decision of the Chair is had is a question of doubt, but usually the point of order is made and debated only on appeal.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Chair will excuse me. I do not think the President apprehended what I said, that the bill must be taken up just as it was, and so taken up it was not open to amendment; that any bill which is subject to amendment can not be taken up in the manner that this bill was; that is, under Rule IX. That was the proposition I submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will overrule that point of order on the ground that the motion itself to take up is not open to amendment, but when the motion has been adopted and the bill is before the Senate the bill is like any other bill or proposition open to amendment, debate, or discussion. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Iowa will pardon me just one moment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I was presiding when the Senator from Virginia charges that he had cause of complaint touching the resolution which he offered. I simply desire to say that the presiding officer heard very distinctly a Senator in his seat object to the present consideration of the resolution, and as presiding officer I announced that the resolution went over under the rules.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Now, Mr. President, was it not my full privilege to have known that an objection was made and from what source it proceeded or from what Senator? It certainly was not considered at the time by any Senator on the floor and it is not known now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, when interrupted I was about remarking that the distribution of documents to libraries and designated depositaries is provided for in sections 500, 501, and 502 of the Revised Statutes, but the provisions there do not include the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the statutes passed by Congress. In order to cure that defect I introduced the bill to which I have heretofore referred, and which provided:

> That the Secretary of the Interior is required to furnish to incorporated bodies, institutions, and associations to be designated to him by Senators of the several States respectively, and by the Representatives in Congress, and by the Delegate from each Territory, one bound copy of the Statutes of the United States enacted by the Forty-eighth Congress and each succeeding Congress, and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for said Congress and each future Congress, in the manner provided in sections 501 and 502 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the distribution of other books and public documents therein mentioned.

I suppose that provision would have to be made under that bill if it should have become a law by appropriating money the same as is appropriated for the distribution of the other books included in the sections of the Revised Statutes; and so, if this bill should be passed, similar provision would have to be made.

The bill now pending provides:

> That the Public Printer shall deliver to the Interior Department a sufficient number of copies of every Government publication printed at the Government Printing Office (including the publications of all bureaus and offices of the Government) to enable said Department to supply a copy to every depositary of public documents designated according to law.

I suppose that might be held to impose the duty also of making appropriations to meet that additional distribution of documents here provided for. Now, while I should have been quite content with the passage of the bill introduced by myself, which provided simply for the two additional publications, yet I would prefer the bill in the form reported by the committee, inasmuch as many of the publications or documents not now included in the list for distribution are exceedingly valuable to libraries and other designated institutions. I therefore hope that this bill may pass in the form reported from the committee or in some such other form as will at least secure the two publications I provided for in my bill, while, as I have already remarked, I would much prefer to extend the number as provided for in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the object that is sought to be attained by the Senator from Iowa by his bill of the last session and with the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts as to his desire. As I understand it, it is that to these designated depositaries there shall be distributed volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, properly bound, and volumes of the laws of the United States. As I say, I am in full accord with that proposition; but this bill is certainly too sweeping in its terms, and proposes to do that which I do not believe the Senator from Massachusetts would favor doing. Now let us look for a moment at the existing statute. I read from the Revised Statutes, section 497:

> SEC. 497. The Secretary of the Interior is charged with receiving, arranging, and safe-keeping for distribution, and of distributing to the persons entitled by law to receive the same—> all printed journals of the two Houses of Congress, and all other books and documents of every nature whatever, already or hereafter directed by law to be printed or purchased for the use of the Government, except such as are directed to be printed or purchased for the particular use of Congress or of either House thereof, or for the particular use of the Executive or of any of the Departments, and any person whose duty it shall be by law to deliver any of the same shall deliver them at the rooms assigned by the Secretary of the Interior therefor.

This then, I take it, excludes from the distribution to these designated depositaries the reports that we order printed here every day and that are ordered every day in the House of Representatives, but they become by virtue of a law that I will refer to in a moment public documents, whether printed by the order of the two Houses or by the order or the rules of either House. I presume it is not proposed that this vast mass of reports which we print here daily and which are printed in another body sitting in this Capitol shall be distributed to these designated depositaries.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the Senator yield to me? Does he refer to the reports of committees of the respective Houses?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, sir; I refer to reports of committees.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. They are included and distributed under existing law.

Mr. INGALLS. How about the bills put upon our tables every morning?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think they come by the law under the designation of "public documents."

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Iowa state that bills laid on our tables every morning in sheets are printed for and distributed to all these depositaries?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Not at all. The reports of committees accompanying bills and resolutions go, but the bills do not go.

Mr. MANDERSON. If we pass this bill they will all probably go.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will say, in response to the Senator from Nebraska, that while I should prefer to extend somewhat the list provided for in my bill, I am quite content to agree to amend the pending bill by substituting mine, and thereby securing to the libraries and designated depositaries the RECORDS and the Statutes.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think the bill proposed at the last session of Congress by the Senator from Iowa is infinitely preferable to this. Now I will read as to what the term "public documents" means under the law. A statute passed June 23, 1874, provides:

> The term "public document" is hereby defined to be all publications printed by order of Congress or either House thereof.

If this bill shall pass in its present form, then everything that either House shall order printed, whatever may be its character, is to be sent to the Interior Department and distributed under the designated depositary act.

I submit that there is considerable force in the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa on my left [Mr. ALLISON]. If we order only the usual number printed or if we order beyond the usual number and specify what number shall be distributed by either House of Congress, where will the documents be found that are to be sent by the Public Printer to the superintendent of documents in the Interior Department? It seems to me that decidedly the best thing to do with this bill would be to refer it to the Committee on Printing, that they may consider it in connection with other bills of like import that are before them.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senate one moment while I state the history of this matter.

At present every document published by order of either of the two Houses is sent by the Secretary of the Interior to the designated depositaries of public documents, one representing each Senator and one each Representative, making four hundred and one in all, and that includes these important documents that Senators have alluded to, the Rebellion Records and so on. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] at the last session introduced and the Senate passed a bill——

Mr. MANDERSON. May I ask a question for the purpose of correcting a statement the Senator has made? I think he is under a misapprehension. I do not think the Rebellion Records go to the Interior Department at all.

Mr. HOAR. Not under the law for distributing the numbers given to Senators and Representatives, but under the general law which was read by the Senator from Iowa distributing all Government publications.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand they are distributed from the War Department to designated depositaries as well as special depositaries.

Mr. HOAR. They go to the depositaries under that law. The Interior Department found that that law, which meant to include every important publication of the Government, every publication made by order of Congress, did not include, for some reason which it is not necessary now to go into, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the laws, and the Senator from Iowa introduced and the Senate passed a bill to cure that. That did not go through the House of Representatives, and that bill was introduced at this session. In the mean time the association of American Librarians, a very important and learned body, had a convention, and referred to a committee this question of the distribution of public documents, and that committee took the bill of the Senator from Iowa and extended it as it is extended by this amendment. That was introduced here and sent to the Committee on the Library. The Joint Committee on the Library had the librarian of the Interior Department before them and made a careful and thorough investigation. The joint committee of both Houses unanimously agreed as to this provision.

Now, as I understand, it does have the effect suggested by the Senator from Kansas nearest to me [Mr. INGALLS], that it sends to the designated depositaries of public documents every bill which is laid on our tables. The reports which are laid on our tables went before under the other law and have always gone to those places, and the addition to the present distribution will be first the RECORD, second the laws of the United States, third the bills which are laid before Congress, and fourth every document printed at the Government Printer's by any Department of the Government for its use; and of all these things 401 additional copies are to be printed and circulated. Of course the additional expense is the cost of the paper and press-work, nothing else, and now the question is whether that ought to be done in accordance with the request of this convention of American Librarians. They say that they have very constant application for these things.

The theory of this bill is that this is a Government of this Republic by the people thereof, and that the people thereof are entitled to have and it is wise that they should be entitled to have and should have access to everything which is important that shapes the legislation of this country. It is important that every newspaper editor who discusses a Congressional bill or a Congressional measure or the act of a Department should not have to draw on his inner consciousness for the fact, but should have the fact accessible in his State. It is important that every young man who wishes to go on the stump should have the information which enables him to make an intelligent discussion of public affairs, and it is important that there should be one place in every Congressional district and one or two general places in every State, and the farther from the center the more important, where the public who wish to study thoroughly to the bottom what is done in Congress can have access to everything as a matter of course.

Now you leave out a few documents; for instance, you leave out the text of the bills which have been proposed, the bills on silver, the bills on education, the dozen bills that come in as to any particular scheme. A bill is the scheme or theory or purpose of the Senator or member of Congress who introduces it. He is an important public man, a leader of public opinion, a statesman; and it seems to me that a measure which he is willing to reduce to the form of a bill and introduce here is a thing of a good deal of public interest and weight. It is quite as important to fill the shelves of our libraries with such things as with dime novels, although we do it at a rate cheaper than the dime novel.

The value of these depositaries of public documents is in their thoroughness. You get an encyclopedia or work of one hundred volumes and lose one and you have taken 75 per cent. from the value of the rest. It seems to me, therefore, that the little sixpenny additional expense which will be occasioned to the Government by granting the request of these librarians to have these depositaries and collections thorough and absolutely complete is of the slightest importance in the world compared with the having the thing done. As I said, this has been a matter of very great and thorough public consideration. It is the form in which the committee of the Association of American Librarians, to whom the matter was committed, proposed it. It was referred to the Committee on the Library last year, and it has had the careful examination and sanction of the librarians.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he is under the impression that the reports ordered to be printed by the two Houses or by either House of Congress pass to these depositaries?

Mr. HOAR. I am.

Mr. MANDERSON. At once, as they come before this body?

Mr. HOAR. They pass at the end of the session under the present law.

Mr. MANDERSON. In bound volumes. That is correct. But I call the Senator's attention to this matter: Under the law as it now exists the disposition, so far as the Department of the Interior is concerned, as to the usual number of the reports and other public documents, is as follows: The Department of the Interior receives for distribution none of the unbound copies of either documents or journals, but at the end of the session, when one-half of the 1,900 copies are bound, there are then sent to the Department of the Interior of documents 421 copies, of the Journals, 1,970 of the Senate Journal and 2,020 of the House Journal, for distribution to these depositaries and to other places required by the law.

But I think the Senator is mistaken as to his statement in reference to the Record of the Rebellion, and if this bill should become a law as it now reads there would be a duplication in the War Department and the Interior Department as to that work.

The law providing for the distribution of the Record of the Rebellion, passed in 1882, provides—

> The volumes of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion shall be distributed as follows: One thousand copies to the Executive Departments, as now provided by law—

That is, for their use, and not for distribution—

> one thousand copies for distribution by the Secretary of War among officers of the Army and contributors to the work. Eight thousand three hundred copies shall be sent by the Secretary of War to such libraries, organizations, and individuals as may be designated by the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-seventh Congress.

Then it provides that each shall designate twenty-six in number. But none of these volumes, as I understand, are sent to the Department of the Interior for distribution to these libraries from that source, but they receive their supply from the War Department.

Mr. HOAR. In that respect it would be very easy to say "but no publications shall be sent under this law to libraries or depositaries already receiving them."

Mr. MANDERSON. It may be that the bill can be amended to cover that point.

Mr. HOAR. I supposed that the Rebellion Record went in addition to the others that were distributed on the order of Senators and Representatives, and one copy was to be sent to each Government depositary from the Interior Department; but the bills and resolutions I hold on to. I understand that the reports go now.

Mr. MANDERSON. I submit that there is no provision for the binding of bills as there is for reports and resolutions of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. It is not necessary that they should be bound.

Mr. MANDERSON. The question is how they shall be distributed, whether they shall proceed as each bill is printed and laid on the desks of Senators, or whether at the end of the session they shall be collected together.

Mr. HOAR. That will be regulated by the convenience of the Public Printer and the Department.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me that owing to the phraseology of this bill, if it shall become a law, we shall be doubling the copies now required by law to be distributed. The phraseolgy is entirely different from that of the existing statute. This is a direction to the Public Printer which is not contained in the existing law at all, and I should think it would be very likely that under this the Interior Department would distribute one copy in addition to those now provided by law to be distributed to each of these public depositaries. I therefore think if it is to be considered now without a reference to the Committee on Printing it should be amended at the conclusion by a proviso something after this form, which I will submit:

> Provided, That the distribution herein provided for shall be inclusive of that under existing law.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to providing that no documents shall be distributed by this proposed law whose distribution is already provided for by law. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that I shall object to the passage of this bill, but I think it should go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to its going to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska has already made the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Printing. That is the pending question before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. That being so, I have no further statement to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

IRRIGATION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. TELLER. I now move to take up Calendar No. 66, Senate bill 1092, for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 1092) to grant the right of way through the public lands for irrigation purposes was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant the right of way through the public lands of the United States to any canal or ditch company formed for the purpose of irrigation, and duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, which shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation, and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of the ground occupied by the water of the canal and its laterals, and fifty feet on each side of the center thereof; also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of the canal or ditch material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of such canal or ditch.

Mr. TELLER. The bill is simply, as I said before, for the purpose of making definite a certain provision of the Revised Statutes which will be found in section 2339. I will read what the statutes say on this subject:

> And the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes herein specified—

That is for irrigation—

> is acknowledged and confirmed; but whenever any person, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injures or damages the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the party injured for such injury or damage.
> SEC. 2340. All patents granted, or pre-emption or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested and accrued water-rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water-rights, as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section.

This is not to enlarge the right to the ditch companies in any manner, but to provide simply that the ditch companies shall file with the local land office and with the Secretary of the Interior the defined line of their ditch, for the protection of the people who shall subsequently take the public lands. That is all that need be said. It gives them no rights they do not have, but it imposes a duty upon them which was not imposed by the original law.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE PUBLIC-LAND STRIP.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of Order of Business 63, being Senate bill 624. It is a bill which passed the Senate at the last session and a similar bill passed the House also.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 624) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized territory south of the State of Kansas, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, which were, in line 3, after the words "United States," to insert "except those providing for pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land entries of the public lands," and in line 14, after the word "the," to strike out "United States surveyor-general for Colorado" and insert "Secretary of the Interior;" so that bill as amended will read:

> That the laws of the United States, except those providing for pre-emption, timber-culture, and desert-land entries of the public lands, are hereby extended over the unorganized Territory south of the States of Kansas and Colorado and between the Indian Territory and the Territory of New Mexico, known as the public-land strip; and that for the purpose of the execution of said laws said public-land strip is hereby created a land district and is annexed to the judicial district of Kansas; and the subdivisional lines of townships in said public-land strip may be surveyed under current appropriations for the surveying service, the work to be done under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I offer the following amendment, to come in as a proviso at the end of the bill:

> Provided, That the President is authorized to reserve a strip through said unorganized territory, not to exceed 5 miles in width, for use as a trail for the passage of cattle from the State of Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not notice the reading of the bill. I ask the Senator from Kansas whether he has in it a sufficient description of the tract of country to which the bill applies.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think there can be any mistake about it. It is described as "the unorganized territory south of the States of Kansas and Colorado and between the Indian Territory and the Territory of New Mexico, known as the public-land strip." It is designated on the map of the United States, published by the authority of the Interior Department, as "public lands;" that is to say, these words are printed across the face of the tract of land, as shown on the map. It is the only tract of public land which lies south of the States of Kansas and Colorado and between the Indian Territory and New Mexico.

Mr. HARRISON. There is one further question, Mr. President. I recollect having considered to some extent this proposition at the last Congress. We have a strip of country here now over which we extend the land laws of the United States, and therefore invite settlement; but it is not attached to any State; no State laws can be enforced there; and we have this anomalous condition of affairs, that we have citizens living upon this land who are not citizens of any organized Territory of the United States nor of any State of the United States.

It seemed to me that this legislation ought to dispose of that strip. I recollect the idea in my mind was that the line between Colorado and Kansas should be extended south, and that the portion of this strip lying south of the State of Kansas should be attached to that State and that the portion lying south of the State of Colorado to that State, and I think now some such provision ought to accompany this bill; for while we attach it to a United States judicial district, yet we do not give the people any government at all. They have no laws except such general laws of the United States as might be applicable; none of the laws applicable to any of the Territories cover them, and there is no State or Territorial Legislature that has any power to make any laws for them. I do not see how they can organize or have any sheriff to enforce the laws, or any clerk, or recorder, or other officer.

It seems to me the provisions of the bill do not go far enough. I do not believe in extending the land laws of the United States over a strip of territory that is not within the bounds of some organized State or Territory, yet that is the anomalous condition in which we propose to put the people whom we invite into this land strip.

Mr. PLUMB. That is all exactly as the Senator from Indiana has stated it, but he will remember that we can not add this territory to any State without the consent of that State. That would necessarily take a great deal of time and might result also in no consent being given.

The land is now open to settlement and it is already settled upon. There are people already upon it. The laws have recognized for a great many years the right of settlers to go on the unsurveyed public domain. The difference between these people and the people living on other portions of the public domain is only that these people are not within the limits of any territory. The Committee on Public Lands did not care to get into the very extensive and interesting field of inquiry as to what should become of these people politically, whether the civil jurisdiction of the State of Kansas, of the Territory of New Mexico, or of the State of Texas, or of some other adjacent organization should be extended over them, or whether they should be left to be incorporated in time into the Indian Territory. Something is to be said in favor of all these propositions, and, of course, equally something against them.

But the one thing which is the foundation of order is title to the land on which men live. The one thing which more than anything else is the occasion of disorder is the lack of title. I have seen in the State of Colorado ten thousand people living on a tract of land less than a mile square, without any municipal organization, and there was no place under the shining sun in which life or property was any more secure than it was in that particular place. But there was title and ample opportunity to acquire it. The people who go upon this public-land strip as well as the people who are there now, if we were to give them title, for all the purposes to be subserved during the brief time we shall leave them in that condition, will take care of themselves and of their property interests in such a way that no violence will be done either to person or property within the limits of that Territory. Therefore the Public Lands Committee felt perfectly warranted in reporting this measure to the Senate, fulfilling the full measure of the jurisdiction of that committee as it does, and meeting the most obvious phase of the circumstances in which these people are now situated, leaving to the Congress of the United States such further legislation, either with the consent of some adjoining State that may be willing to take on this territory, or by the extension of the political jurisdiction of some Territory of the United States, as, for instance, New Mexico or the Indian Territory, over them.

But it certainly is not a valid objection to this bill that it does not go far enough if, avoiding the intricate and interesting questions to which the Senator from Indiana referred, we do that which is obviously proper and necessary, and which is in accordance practically with the promise we have made to all those who go on the unsurveyed public lands, by giving them that measure of protection which results from land titles, because as we have authorized citizens of the United States to go upon the unsurveyed public lands and have pledged them that we will give them title, along with that goes the proposition to survey the land in such a way that they may know the metes and bounds of their respective possessions, and then we must either establish a land office for their special benefit or attach them to an existing one, in order that they may file their respective claims and in due time by the settlement and payment of money, either or both, acquire title to the land on which they have settled under and in accordance with the provisions of law.

I should have been very glad, if the committee had had time and jurisdiction, to have entered upon these other questions; but in the mean time here are many thousands of people on this land already, and while we were waiting for the consent of some State to take them or debating whether we should add them to some Territory there is all the difficulty existing there which grows out of uncertain titles everywhere and which we can relieve by passing a measure of this kind.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this bill provides that the public-land strip is created a land district and is annexed to the judicial district of Kansas. I suppose that means, of course, the United States judicial district of Kansas; and yet I do not know how anybody living on that tract of land could get into that United States court except possibly as a defendant in some criminal action. I do not know how any of them could bring any suit there. They are not citizens of any State; so that neither in any litigation between themselves nor in any litigation with anybody else could they, as it seems to me, have any access to the courts of Kansas for any purpose at all to try their titles or to settle them. While I agree that it is proper that the people who are there should be put in a way to get their titles, and that any unoccupied lands there should be open to homesteaders, it seems to me that this legislation ought all to proceed together, and that we ought not to invite people to go in there to settle, we have never in the history of this Government invited them to go into unorganized territory where no laws were in force whatever and take up public lands.

It seems to me that the Senator from Kansas, if this measure were referred to his committee, when he reported it, as settling the question of the use of the lands, might send it to the Committee on Territories or some other appropriate committee, so that the bill might be amended so as to incorporate such provisions as would establish some sort of civil government over these people. I think that ought to go along with the extension of the land laws; I think they always have gone together; and I do not think it would seriously delay the matter if the Senator would take some such course with the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the course now suggested would make serious delay. There is no reason in the world why the Committee on Territories can not take up separately, as it does all questions of the organization of Territories, apart from any disposition of the public lands, or their condition, and consider the question of a political organization for this community. But there is every reason why there should not be delay in the passage of this bill, which, as I said before, passed the Senate at the last session. A similar measure passed the last House, but the two measures crossed each other, as is frequently the case, and neither of them became a law. There is urgent necessity now for the passage of this bill because of the great number of people and the number constantly being increased by new persons going in. As I said, the only prime question with all those people, the first one they are interested in, is the question of title.

Now, the attention of the Committee on Territories having been called to this matter, they can take the question up. They may attach the strip to New Mexico; they may attach it to Kansas for temporary purposes, or to the Indian Territory; I do not care where; I have no choice about it. But about all that class of questions there will be some debate, and that debate would impede, if it did not finally prevent, the passage of the bill, to which there can certainly be no objection, and that is to enable these people to get the title which we promised them when we invited them to go on the public domain.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, there is one embarrassment to me in the consideration of this bill, and I ask my colleague to think of it. What authority has Congress, in any way whatever, to interfere, either by addition or subtraction, by implication or by direct action, with the territorial area and limits of the State of Kansas, without the consent of that State first obtained? I think there should be something done with this unorganized region known as "No man's land." There are about 3,500 square miles, I believe, that are practically populated to-day——

Mr. PLUMB. About 6,000.

Mr. INGALLS. About 6,000 square miles that are practically inhabited by a settled population, not nomadic but settled, permanent, with cattle ranches, farms along the borders of the streams, living there absolutely without any jurisdiction of law over them, and living, as I am advised, practically in peace and tranquillity. I have heard the number variously estimated. I should not dare to mention it, but there must be several thousand people, and a very great deal of personal property and betterments that would be entitled under other circumstances to the protection of law. There, of course, is no possibility of acquiring title to land, because it has not been surveyed, and there are no land offices where the intention of persons to buy can be received or where their boundaries can be ascertained. They have no means of appealing to any court for the enforcement of their rights or the redress of their wrongs.

It is an anomalous, unprecedented, extraordinary condition of affairs, that ought to be remedied. It is clearly within the province of Congress to create that tract into a land district, and by that means to enable people to acquire title to their property. But how the limits of the State of Kansas can be practically enlarged and expanded so as to take in this territory without the consent of that State first affirmatively obtained I do not understand, for the Constitution provides that "no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress."

Mr. COKE. Does this bill propose to annex this territory to Kansas?

Mr. INGALLS. To the extent of attaching it to the judicial district of Kansas for judicial purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. In other words, we simply extend the jurisdiction of the United States judge there over this territory.

Mr. INGALLS. And the limitations of that district are the limitations that are recognized as those of the boundaries of the State of Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. By the Federal law.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, by the Federal law and by the State law. While I would favor any arrangement which might give these people settled and permanent institutions, I think the bill goes too far, and that it would be well to declare that the laws of the United States are extended over them and create a land district, but when we go into the subject of legislating as to the enforcement of their rights and the redress of wrongs to which they may be subjected, it seems to me to be a great deal more in accordance with the present system to attach them to a Territory than to a State.

Mr. PLUMB. That phraseology happens to be the Senator's own. He introduced the bill last year and I quoted that idea from him.

Mr. INGALLS. That does not make it any better.

Mr. PLUMB. I thought it did. I will accept, however, any modification.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill was undoubtedly prepared and handed to me, and I introduced it by request, I presume, as I do a great many bills without particular examination; and it would be very inequitable to hold a man responsible for the verbal construction of a bill introduced under those circumstances. But still, even if that were true, my observations to-day would simply show that I had steadily gone on improving in my intellectual condition since that time, and was not stationary or reactionary.

Mr. PLUMB. I am probably about a year behind my colleague anyway, and so if he is strenuous on that point——

Mr. INGALLS. No, I am not. I only made a suggestion.

Mr. PLUMB. If he thinks a district which we create by Federal law, with a district judge whose appointment we provide for and whose salary we pay and whose movements and jurisdiction we wholly control, can not be extended so as to embrace within that jurisdiction a little additional piece of territory, I have no objection to striking it out.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator does not mean to say that this bill would give access in any civil proceeding of any kind to any citizen of this territory to the United States circuit or district court of Kansas, does he?

Mr. PLUMB. I think it would, undoubtedly in criminal causes.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly not. The general law of citizenship would apply; and he does not give a man living there any citizenship. If you made him a citizen of Kansas, he could not go into that court.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to striking out this provision. No doubt, as my colleague says, he introduced the bill mentioned at the request of some one; and of course, also, he may very properly have changed his mind. It is of no consequence in any event. What I want is the proper thing now, and I am entirely willing that that part be stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make one observation before it is stricken out, if I may be permitted. The Constitution of the United States provides for admiralty jurisdiction to be vested by Congress where it chooses, and it vests the jurisdiction over offenses committed on the high seas and over some other things on the high seas in the district courts, providing that the district court shall have jurisdiction in particular cases. It also gives us jurisdiction over the Territories, the power of absolute legislation; and I do not see why it is not exactly the same thing to provide that a particular district court shall have jurisdiction over a Territory that it is to provide that a particular district court shall have jurisdiction over the high seas. Does it not stand on the same principle and equally within the authority of Congress?

Mr. PLUMB. Now the purpose which I had in view, which is one that is perfectly obvious and which there can be no possible question about here, is to extend the public land laws to that district in order that those people who are now there at the invitation of the Government may get title. I have no objection, if there is any question about the meaning of this clause, to strike it out.

Mr. HARRISON. I would not move to strike it out. I was only calling attention to the inadequacy of the provision; but perhaps it would confer jurisdiction upon the United States district court in Kansas to proceed for violations of the criminal laws of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt it would.

Mr. HARRISON. If it would, so far so good.

Mr. PLUMB. This is not the only anomalous condition of things with which we are confronted. We have a great many people, a number of thousands of white people, citizens of the United States, in the Indian Territory who are in just the same anomalous condition and a worse one, because they can not get title to land down there at all. We are going along with this matter perhaps a little leisurely, but still we shall reach it in due time and provide for it; but that would be no reason why we should withhold from the people on this strip of public land a perfectly obvious right, and one we have promised them.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to a motion to adjourn? There is hardly a quorum present and it is now past 5 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Kansas yield the floor?

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he will be willing to yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. PLUMB. I think we have got about through with the bill. I should like to have the consideration of it continued for a moment or two, at all events.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Indiana is clearly right. If this court were established, there is no mode by which the citizens of that Territory can have access to it in the ordinary difficulties that occur. The action of Congress, as I understand it, in organizing a Territory is to create a Territorial court and by special law provide for the trial of causes and the jurisdiction of that court.

If it were true that the laws of the United States provided for every case which may occur, then the provision of the bill extending the jurisdiction of the district court to Kansas would have some effect, but why extend the land laws over this organized Territory when if there is any controversy between two citizens in that Territory there is no means provided for the jurisdiction of the court to take effect upon them. You must have some special legislation, because the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States and the laws of the United States are not adapted to the great majority of cases that will arise between citizen and citizen. If one citizen objects to the right of possession of another under the land laws of the United States extended over them, the bill affords no relief to that case, and it is highly questionable whether without an act of Congress the question of title even could be tried in the district court of Kansas arising under the land laws of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not myself anticipate that anything will be practical except the extension of the criminal laws of the United States over this tract of land.

Mr. CALL. The criminal laws of the United States provide for a very small portion of the difficulties between man and man. There are questions of admiralty and questions of piracy which are not adapted to the ordinary cases which arise between man and man.

Obviously it occurs to me that if you wish to provide for the extension of the land laws over this unorganized district you must provide for some mode of trial of the rights that may arise under them; and if you wish to extend the criminal laws of the United States you must extend the range of the criminal laws so as to meet the cases that will arise in this population.

Therefore it seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana is very pertinent, that this would be very imperfect and unwise legislation without annexing it to some Territory.

Mr. PLUMB. All the questions that relate to the disposition of the public land and the acquisition of title thereunder are practically settled by the action of the local land office and the General Land Office on review, so that the jurisdiction of the court down there would not be material at all to the question of acquisition of title. I have not the slightest objection, as I said, to striking out that clause, as it will come up very properly in connection with some extension of jurisdiction over that section of country. As I presume the Committee on Territories will take that up presently, I think I shall move to strike out the words, "and is annexed to the judicial district of Kansas."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves, in line 10, after the word "land district," to strike out the words "and is annexed to the judicial district of Kansas." If there be no objection that amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Following the suggestion of the Senator from New York, I move, after the word "over," in line 5, to insert the word "all;" so as to read, "are hereby extended over all the unorganized territory." Although I do not think it necessary, as the suggestion has been made and it does not hurt the bill I propose the insertion of the word "all."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move, in line 7, after the words "New Mexico," to insert "and north of Texas." Those are merely descriptive words, but further identify the boundaries of the land.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 9, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

On motion of Mr. BEACH, by unanimous consent the reading of so much of the Journal as related to the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions was dispensed with.

The Journal as read was approved.

AGENT FOR WINNEBAGO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, dated the 8th instant, inclosing a recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the insertion in the act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1887, of an item providing for an agent for the Winnebago Indians in Wisconsin, at a salary of $1,500 per annum.

The matter is respectfully submitted for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1886.

LAWS GOVERNING STEAM-VESSELS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam-Vessels, looking to a new regulation of the laws governing steam-vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN F. CADWALLADER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Attorney-General, with an inclosure, relative to the account of John F. Cadwallader for writing back records of United States district courts for the southern district of Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

SINKING FUND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a statement of the total amount applied to the sinking fund between June 30, 1884, and July 1, 1885, in conformity with a resolution of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SILVER BALANCES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the resolutions of the House respecting silver balances and circulation; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has the Chair directed that communication to be printed?

The SPEAKER. It is not a response to the resolutions of the House, but simply a letter stating they would be responded to at as early a day as possible.

DEFICIENCY ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting deficiency estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLERKS, ETC., IN NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a list of clerks and other persons employed in the Navy Department, the time each has been employed, and the sums paid to each for the year 1885, and stating that they are fully employed, and that their services are necessary for the dispatch of the public business; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES E. CREECY VS. UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a report of the case of Charles E. Creecy, administrator of L. R. Byrne, deceased, vs. United States; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, with the consent of the House, refers this communication to the Committee on Patents, because the original papers were sent to the Court of Claims with the consent of that committee. It is really a claim, however.

SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read twice, referred as indicated, and ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. 222) to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia—to the Committee on the Militia.

A bill (S. 967) to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln—to the Committee on the Territories.

ASTRONOMICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The SPEAKER also, in accordance with the statute, laid before the House the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Joint Committee on Printing:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 5, 1886.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the annual volume of the astronomical and meteorological observations of the Naval Observatory for 1883, 1884, and 1885 be printed, and that 1,800 additional copies of each report be printed; of which 300 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 700 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 800 copies for the use of the Navy Department.

COMMITTEE SITTING DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the passage of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs have leave, until further order, to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection leave will be granted.

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now call the committees of the House for reports.

SUBPŒNA FOR CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HAMMOND (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk. This report from the Judiciary Committee was prepared by the chairman of the committee, Mr. TUCKER, but he is unavoidably absent this morning on account of the death of the wife of one of his colleagues, and the committee think it important that the report be submitted to the House without delay.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged report under the order of the House already made. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. TUCKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the subpœna duces tecum from the supreme court of the District of Columbia directed to Hon. John B. Clark, jr., Clerk of the House of Representatives, commanding him to appear as a witness in the case of Lemon vs. Fitzgerald et al., before Albert Harper, 480½ Louisiana avenue, at office of H. O. Claughton, esq., on the 6th day of February, 1886, at 2 o'clock p. m., "and bring with you the bound volume containing the enrolled bills reported from the Appropriations Committee in regard to pensions made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, which is now in the possession of the Government Printer—witness, D. K. Cartter, chief-justice, &c.; R. J. Meigs, clerk, &c.; by R. J. Meigs, jr., clerk, &c. [seal supreme court District of Columbia]"—beg leave to report:

The committee deem it important to protect with strict care the privileges of the House in respect of its officers and its records and papers upon file in its various offices and under charge and in custody of its officers—subject, however, to this supreme duty: The committee think that all proper access to these records and papers should be allowed in furtherance of the ends of justice in civil and criminal proceedings in the ordinary courts of justice, but so as not to endanger the safety nor surrender the custody of such records and papers.

The committee, in regard to the present matter, think that justice will be done, consistently with the privileges of the House, by permitting the court, in such manner as shall be accordant with its rules, to examine, by witness or otherwise, the records and papers in the possession of the House or its officers, and take evidence in respect thereto and to take copies thereof, so that neither records nor papers shall be removed from their proper place of deposit in the Capitol or from the safe-keeping and custody of the officers of the House.

This course is not only dictated by sound reason and public policy, but sustained by recent precedents.

In the Forty-sixth Congress an elaborate report was made by the Judiciary Committee with the recommendation of the following resolutions, which passed the House after debate, in which the principles of the resolutions were not seriously questioned. (Congressional Record, first session Forty-sixth Congress, 60.)

Resolved, 1. That no officer or employé of the House of Representatives has the right, either voluntarily or in obedience to a subpœna duces tecum, to produce any document, paper, or book belonging to the files of the House before any court or officer, nor to permit any copy of any testimony given or paper filed in any investigation before the House, or any of its committees, or of any other paper belonging to the files of the House, except such as may be authorized by statute to be copied, and such as the House itself may have made public, to be taken without the consent of the House first obtained.

2. That the consent of the House is hereby given in the case of the United States against Col. D. S. Stanley, now pending before the general court-martial sitting in the city of New York, to have made and properly proven such copies of the papers mentioned in the subpœna duces tecum issued by the judge-advocate of said court and directed to Ferris Finch, esq., file clerk of the House of Representatives, on the 16th instant, as may be desired; but the originals thereof shall not be removed from the files of the House.

In the Forty-fourth Congress this House by resolution authorized three of its members to answer a summons to testify before a grand jury of the District of Columbia. (Congressional Record, first session Forty-fourth Congress, 1847.)

Your committee call attention to the fact that it does not appear that the production of this book is necessary to learn the truth as to any issue pending.

Your committee therefore report the following resolutions with a recommendation that they do pass:

1. Resolved, That by the privilege of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in possession of the House of Representatives can by the mandate or process of the ordinary courts of justice be taken from such control or possession but by its permission.

2. That when it appears by the order of a court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice or before any judge or such legal officer for the promotion of justice, this House will take such orders thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House.

3. That Hon. John B. Clark, Clerk of the House, be authorized to appear at the place and before the officer named in the subpœna duces tecum before mentioned, but shall not take with him the book named therein, nor any document or paper on file in his office or under his control or in his possession as Clerk of the House.

4. That the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all witnesses and proper parties to the proceeding, and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House, and take copies of any documents or papers in possession or control of said Clerk, and any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said documents and papers by the said Clerk shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under said Clerk.

5. That a copy of this report and these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpœna aforementioned.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been argued and decided by the House before, and the Committee on the Judiciary, deeming further consumption of time unnecessary, requested me to demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolutions.

The previous question was ordered, and the resolutions were then agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. HEPBURN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill (H. R. 2929) to amend the act dividing the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and to divide the eastern and western districts thereof into divisions, establish district and circuit courts of the United States therein, and provide for the times and places for holding such courts, and for other other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WARD.

On motion of Mr. HAMMOND, by unanimous consent the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4242) to provide for the adjustment of matters connected with certain judicial proceedings in Pennsylvania in which the United States was a party; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1136) additional to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," passed June 3, 1864; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EAST AND WEST RAILROAD COMPANY OF ALABAMA.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 34) to authorize the East and West Railroad Company of Alabama to maintain a bridge across the Coosa River; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS SAMPSON.

Mr. IRION, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4139) for the relief of Thomas Sampson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EXPOSITION AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. IRION, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported back with amendment joint resolution (H. Res. 108) authorizing the several Executive Departments of the Government to loan the North, Central, and South American Exposition at New Orleans certain articles for exhibit; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PREVENTION OF YELLOW FEVER.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for House joint resolution 28, a bill (H. R. 5542) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the truth of alleged discoveries of the specific cause of yellow fever and of a method of preventing that disease by inoculation and to obtain all information possible as to the cause and prevention of that disease; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed; and, by unanimous consent, H. Res. 28 was laid on the table.

FEES ON INVOICES.

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4138) to limit the exaction of fees or the levy of taxes for the consular verification and authentication of invoices; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN EXHIBITION AT LONDON, MAY, 1886.

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, also reported back adversely the joint resolution (H. Res. 15) concerning an American exhibition to be held in London in May, 1886; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FEE ON DOMESTIC MONEY-ORDERS.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4177) to reduce the fee on domestic money-orders for sums not exceeding $5; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS.

On motion of Mr. BARRY, by unanimous consent the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4420) to authorize the publication of a new edition of the Postal Laws and Regulations; and the same was referred to the Joint Committee on Printing.

CLERK-HIRE TO POSTMASTERS.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 4415) to make the allowances for clerk-hire to postmasters of the first and second class post-offices cover the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 80) to provide for the deposit in the Treasury of the receipts of the money-order system and to pay for its expenses out of appropriations; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; and the same were referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 1455) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary McIntosh; and
A bill (H. R. 4106) granting a pension to Stephen M. McAlister.

CHRISTINE BERGNER.

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON, by unanimous consent the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4524) granting a pension to Christine Bergner; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOHN P. T. DAVIS.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 449) for the relief of John P. T. Davis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 3443) to enable the Secretary of War to pay Rane C. Hutchison for services rendered and expenses incurred in the military service of the United States; which was laid on the table, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SIDNEY R. SMITH.

Mr. KLEINER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1511) for the relief of Sidney R. Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF MATERIAL FROM GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4982) to enable the Public Printer to continue in effect the provisions of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Public Printer to remove certain material from the Government Printing Office," approved February 6, 1883; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WAR TAXES OF 1861.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reference of reports having been gone through with, the Chair will now, under the rule, call committees for the consideration of bills for one hour. The hour begins at eighteen minutes before 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentlemen from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] is entitled to the floor for twelve minutes on the bill (H. R. 3) to prevent the claim of the war taxes under the act of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof, by the United States as set-off against States having claims against the General Government.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, by an act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, a tax was levied on "the United States," which was apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia as follows:

Alabama	$329,313 33
Arkansas	261,586 00
California	254,533 67
Colorado	22,905 33
Connecticut	308,214 00
Dakota	3,241 33

And that act further provided that the President should divide the States and Territories into convenient collection districts and appoint assessors and collectors in each district so formed. Oaths were to be taken and bonds filed by such officers, and they were empowered and required to collect the same, and when necessary to seize and sell property of individuals in either of said districts to an amount equal to the whole tax so levied, and all the necessary machinery created for getting the tax or property to an amount equal thereto.

Section 53 of said act provided that any State or Territory might assume, collect, and pay into the Treasury of the United States the tax thus imposed, and in all cases where the tax should be thus collected without cost to the General Government a credit or allowance of 15 per cent. should be allowed to apply as part of said sum up to a certain date and 10 per cent. up to a certain other time. That law stands to-day on the statute-books of the nation unrepealed and only partially executed. Some of the States have paid the full amount of their quota, some only a part, and some none at all. There remains yet due and unpaid the sum of $2,624,509.59.

No disposition is manifested by those in arrears to pay it, and no effort is being made to collect it, except by the process of offsetting any sum or sums that from time to time may become due from the general Government to such delinquent States. We were officially informed in 1884, by the then Secretary of the United States Treasury, that the rule up to that time had been invariable, as applied to all the States in arrears, to apply all such sums as from time to time might become due to the States from the United States toward the liquidation of such balances, and we all know that such is still the rule.

The last official statement of the United States Treasurer shows that the State of Georgia owes the United States $512,959.58.

In 1883, by an act of Congress the sum of $35,555.42 was appropriated to that State in full of a claim which, while it may have been just, was very, very old. The accounting officer of the Treasury, acting in harmony with a rule which was not only just, but was the same that had been, was then, and still is applied to each and every other State, refused to pay over the money to the State of Georgia, but proposed to enter it as a credit in partial liquidation of her long-standing indebtedness to the General Government. This last financial transaction has probably led to the introduction of the bill under consideration—a bill to prevent the claim of the war taxes under the act of August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereof, by the United States, as set-off against States having claims against the General Government.

This is an impartial statement of the case presented to the House for our consideration and approval or disapproval.

If this bill should pass it takes from the Government its last and only practical or available means of ever collecting a dollar of the $2,624,509.54 which is due to it.

That the assessment or apportionment of the said tax was fair and equitable is not doubted. That it was necessary no one will deny. That it created a debt against each of the States is not disputed. That it was cheerfully paid by some of the States, and forcibly collected from others in part or in whole, is just as certain.

Then can we be asked with reason or propriety to say, by the passage of this bill, that the American Congress will punish the States or the people who responded to the call of the country in its hour of peril and dire necessity by discriminating against them? that the American Congress is willing to change a rule which has been inflexibly enforced against them to favor a State or a people who were at least dilatory in meeting their just proportion of this measure for the common good? Are we willing to say, by the passage of this bill, that Georgia, which has paid only $71,407.75, and owes yet $512,959.58; that Mississippi, that has paid only $74,742.57, and owes $338,342.10; that Alabama, which has paid only $8,491.40, and owes $520,821.87, shall be released from their liability, when Louisiana has paid in money $268,515.12, when North Carolina has paid in money $386,194.45, when by the sale of lands there has been forcibly collected from Arkansas $184,082.18, from South Carolina $377,961.30, from Virginia $515,569.72, from Florida $43,529.80?

By what process of reasoning can an honest man conclude that there is an element of justice in such a course? And yet a vote for this bill would be to indorse this glaring wrong.

I have thus far only adverted to the wrong which would be done to certain of the Southern States by passing this bill, but its injustice becomes still more apparent when it is considered that of this same tax for the common good of all the States—

In the Forty-eighth Congress I had the honor to introduce a bill which received a favorable recommendation from the Committee on Claims, to which it was referred, the purpose of which was to do just what is contemplated by the bill under consideration, to wit: relieve all of the States and Territories from all balances against them growing out of said tax of 1861 and acts amendatory thereof; but another provision, coupled with the foregoing, was one that provided that all sums which had been paid by any of the States and Territories should be credited to them severally on the books of the United States Treasury, and any balance found due after such credit had been entered should be paid to them respectively.

This bill was never reached and considered by the House, but the Committee on Claims having the same in charge submitted a favorable report, a copy of which I herewith submit and make a part of my argument:

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 6047.

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6047) to adjust certain accounts between the United States and the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, has had the same under consideration, and reports:

Under the act of August 5, 1861 (12 Stat. at L., 292), a direct tax of $20,000,000 was laid upon the United States, and was apportioned among the different States and Territories and the District of Columbia, based on population.

By section 53 it was provided that each State might assume the payment of its quota thereof, and if it did so on or before the second Tuesday in February next, after the passage of the act, it should have a deduction of 15 per cent. on so much of the quota of direct tax apportioned to such State in lieu of the compensation of officers for collecting the tax as was actually paid into the Treasury on or before the last day of June, and a deduction of 10 per cent. upon so much as should be paid into the Treasury thereafter and before the last day of September of that year.

Some of the loyal States assumed their quotas, while others did not do so. Of those which assumed the payment some paid prior to the last day of June, others prior to the last day of September, while some of them have only paid in part, and still owe balances.

Of the loyal States which did not assume their quotas, the amount thereof has been collected from some in full by the First Comptroller stopping in the Treasury sums going to them on account of 5 percents from sales of public lands and other allowed claims in their favor against the United States.

An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States was passed June 7, 1862 (12 Stat. at L., 422). This contained no provision for the assumption of its quota by the insurrectionary States. Under this act a portion of the quota of some of the States was collected directly from the owners of real estate, and other portions were collected by sales of real estate, while from others nothing whatever was collected.

Since the war, as in the case of loyal States, the First Comptroller has withheld and applied to the quotas of these States such sums as they were entitled to receive on account of 5 percents from the sales of public lands or upon other allowed claims in favor of these States respectively against the United States.

The quota of each State is not a liability upon the State as such, but upon the real estate of the people of the State, and was by the law made a lien upon each piece thereof in the proportion of its value to the aggregate value of the real estate in that State.

The quota of each State and Territory has been charged to it upon the books of the Treasury, and such sums as have been paid or collected, whether directly or by sale of property, has been credited against this quota, as has also all such sums as were going to said State on account of 5 percents from sales of public lands and other allowed accounts. This system of withholding sums due to States and crediting them on account of this tax due by its citizens (or by only a portion of its citizens where some have paid) is a source of constant dissatisfaction and friction, and at the last session of Congress a bill was passed providing that a claim should be paid directly to a State in money for the purpose of avoiding its being thus credited, and a bill is now pending in the House to pay in money to a State an amount which has been credited in the Treasury upon its quota of this direct tax. The extreme undesirability of these issues over accounts between the States and the General Government can not be overstated, and is so apparent as not to require to be more than mentioned. The injustice, too, of the utter inequality of the payments is so apparent as to require no argument as to the importance of adopting some mode of adjusting and equalizing them, and if this can not be done absolutely, then at least as far as is practicable and possible.

To do this is the purpose of the bill under consideration. It provides that the account of each State and Territory be credited with a sum equal to all collections made from each State and Territory, or any citizen thereof, under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and acts amendatory thereto, with an additional sum of 15 per cent. on such payments made without cost to the United States, and also to relinquish all claim for all sums remaining unpaid on said direct tax. This will give to those States which assumed and paid their quotas the benefit of the deductions to which they thus entitled themselves. In those cases in which the tax has been collected from individuals, either in money directly or by sale of land, it provides, by an amendment herewith submitted, that the amount thus paid back shall be made to the State in trust for those of her citizens who have paid the same.

The bill was fully and carefully considered by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Charles J. Folger. On June 14 ultimo he wrote a letter, in which he uses the following language:

"The purpose of the bill is to relieve and discharge from further liability for that tax those States and Territories which have not paid the portion thereof apportioned to them respectively; and to repay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to those States and Territories which have paid any portion, the sums by them respectively paid. Though by the act above cited this tax was made an annual one, an attempt to collect it for more than one year has never been made. By that attempt there were collected about $15,000,000, principally from the States which did not seek to go out of the Union; and there were left uncollected about $5,000,000, principally in the States which did seek to go out of the Union. The sum uncollected remains a charge against these States, and, for the purposes of this letter, it may be assumed that it is a valid and enforceable charge. It is plain, however, that no legislator at this day would propose to raise revenue by a tax of that kind. There is no need of resorting to such methods. The revenue of the Government from sources not so extraordinary, and collectible by means and appliances not so objectionable as those involved therein, are ample for its purposes. They are, indeed, superabundant, and the concern of statesmen is rather how they may be reduced than how they may be increased. The Government then needs not the money to be got by enforcing this tax.

"At the same time, it is plain that to enforce it would put a grievous burden upon the people of the States which are in default in payment. It needs no array of facts to show this. Congress in one if not in both branches has this session considered the proposition of large pecuniary aid to these people to help them place and keep up common schools, and the Senate has passed a bill therefor.

"If there be need for that succor, there would be harm in enforcing this charge. It is to be considered, too, that while taxes are seldom looked upon with favor, this would be specially objectionable. The purpose for which it was laid can but be remembered with distaste. It can scarcely be expected that there would be cheerful aid from the State authorities in the enforcement of it. It may be doubted whether there would be any. Indeed it would, without further legislation, have to be enforced by the machinery provided by the act under which it was laid. This would call for the appointment of numerous Federal officials, who would go among the people as obnoxious exactors. I think it must be conceded that there is, and ever will be, great reluctance to ever setting about the collection of this tax. That it never had great favor is shown by that it was never put in force but one year. In practical effect, then, the law for it is obsolete. Why, then, should there remain this unenforced liability, a menace to the people, the enforcement of which is called for by no public need nor by any public opinion?

"In my judgment, the people and the property of the States in default should be relieved and discharged from it.

"But to give such relief and discharge would be to put an inequality of burden upon the States which paid, unless they in turn were in some way relieved. This the bill proposes to do by repaying to them the sums received from them. Assuming that the tax was lawful, and the collection, as far as made, was warranted, this, apart from the circumstances, would be a proposition to donate to the States surplus moneys of the United States—a proposition which I should not favor. But, as connected with the proposition to discharge from onerous and needless liability one portion of the people, it takes on a different character; it is presented as an adjustment between different bodies of the people, and is worthy of acceptation. Indeed, it would be unjust to the people of the loyal States to release the people of the once insurrectionary States from their liability without refunding to the former the sums paid by them, and there are analogies in the legislation of Congress. Acts have been passed refunding to States moneys raised by them for the raising, arming, and equipping of troops for the Army of the United States in the civil war and for making other refunds of like character. The purpose of laying this direct tax was to aid in the ultimate payment of the extraordinary expenses of the Government caused by the civil war. The raising, arming, and equipping of troops by the States served to keep down those expenses for the time. It was a voluntary act upon the part of the States. There is no violation of principle or fundamental law in repaying to the States from the funds of the United States the cost thereof. The purpose and effect of this bill is not so unlike in nature to that as not also to be freed from the objections to a bald distribution among the States of what are called the surplus revenues of the United States.

"Under the peculiar facts of the case, and as it is not likely to become a precedent for other disposals of Federal moneys, my judgment is, that the proposed measure is a good one. It is true that exactly equal justice can not be done in carrying out the proposition of the bill. Thus, in some of the Southern States the tax was to some extent enforced. Tax-sales were made of pieces of real estate in instances for less than the value of them. Only the surplus of purchase-money over the tax and charges has been available to the owners, and they have lost the difference between that and the total of the purchase-money, and between the purchase-money and the real value.

"On the other hand, in most, if not all, of the Northern States, the payment to the United States of the tax was assumed by the State government, which collected the amount of its own people in its own tax-levy. Of course, in the changes of citizenship and ownership of taxable property, while a repayment into the State treasury will tend to reduce the amount of State tax, it will not inure to the benefit of some of those who in 1861 were tax-payers. But these failures of full and general compensation in dealing with transactions so long past must ensue, and are not to be potentially urged against proposed measures, which in the main do work equal benefit."

The Comptroller of the Treasury, Hon. William Lawrence, also recommends the passage of this bill in the following terms:

"The object of these bills is to remit, so far as not collected or paid, the direct taxes laid upon and apportioned to the States, Territories, and District of Columbia under the direct tax act of August 5, 1861, and to refund to such States, Territories, and District respectively the amount of such taxes so far as paid in any mode whatever.

"I have considered the subject with care, and now have the honor to state that, in my judgment, it is alike just, judicious, and practicable to remit all such taxes not yet collected, to refund the amounts paid in any form by any State or Territory, and to refund to private persons or their legal representatives all amounts of such tax by them paid or collected by sale of real estate or otherwise."

In view of the status of this tax as exhibited by these facts, your committee fully concur in the recommendations herein set out. In those cases in which the money, wherewith any State stands credited, was collected from its citizens the amount to be returned to said State under this bill should be for the use and benefit of those citizens from whom it was collected, or their legal representatives, and your committee recommends that the bill be amended by adding the following at the end thereof: "Provided, That where the sums, or any part thereof, credited to any State or Territory has been collected from the citizens thereof, either directly or by sale of property, such amount shall be regarded as received by said States in trust for the benefit of those of its citizens from whom it was collected, or their legal representatives."

Your committee recommends that the bill thus amended do pass.

At the commencement of the present session I again introduced the same bill as amended by the Committee on Claims, which is now pending and before the Committee on the Judiciary, and I submit that this bill ought not to pass, but that the one referred to, under the provisions of which the States in default should be released and the States which have paid should be reimbursed, should pass.

But it is argued that this bill H. R. No. 3 should pass because the law under which the tax was levied was unconstitutional. For the purpose of the argument let us admit that it was unconstitutional, and it would follow that no further collections should be made under or by virtue of it and bill H. R. No. 3 should become a law, but only side by side with another provision of law under which all sums heretofore collected under that unconstitutional law should be refunded to those from whom it was collected. Pass this bill to relieve the defaulting States on the ground of an unconstitutional levy, and then we would be told just as gravely that it would be unconstitutional to refund the amounts paid.

I wish the time might come in my day when the Constitution would not be invoked to justify a wrong or whenever men desired to avoid doing right. It has been warped and twisted and misconstrued and misinterpreted in support of every job and scheme and unworthy purpose, when the purpose of its framers was to secure equal and exact justice to every citizen and every section of the Republic.

But, unfortunately for those who invoke its aid in this case to avoid the payment of a just obligation, the Supreme Court of the United States (volume 98, pages 527 and 528) have declared that the laws under which the levy was made was constitutional, in the following language:

One other assignment only remains: It is that the acts of Congress were unconstitutional, because the amount of the direct taxes apportioned to the State of South Carolina was increased by the addition thereto of a penalty of 50 per cent., and, therefore, was not in proportion to the census or enumeration directed to be taken by the second section of the first article of the Constitution.

The assignment rests upon a mistaken construction of the acts of Congress.

It is true that direct taxes must be apportioned among the several States according to the population.

The acts of August 5, 1861, June 7, 1862, and February 6, 1863, did so apportion the tax.

The 50 per cent. penalty was no part of it.

The act of Congress of 1861, which levied the tax, provided for no penalty, except for failure to pay it when it was due; and the penalty charged by the act of 1862 and 1863 was also for default of voluntary payment in due time.

A careful reading of the acts make this very plain.

Throughout a distinction is made between the tax and the added penalty.

It is recognized in the first section of the act of 1862, in the second and in the third, as well as elsewhere.

By the third section the owner of lots or parcels of land was allowed to pay the tax charged thereon (not the tax and penalty) and take a certificate of payment, by virtue whereof the lands would be discharged. It can not, therefore, be maintained that the tax was in conflict with the Constitution.

So far as this bill is concerned it should be defeated by a vote so clear and emphatic as to discourage future attempts to secure legislation so repugnant to justice and fair dealing.

If the Supreme Court are correct in their interpretation, then the tax was legal and therefore the States in default are legally indebted, and this bill releases them, practically, from that indebtedness.

If the assessment was illegal, it was at least necessary for the good of all the States, and was cheerfully paid by some of the parties in interest; from others collections were enforced, and all had the benefits and no part of the Union was more directly or materially benefited than these States now in arrears.

The whole tax should be treated as a loan, and as it was paid, so far as paid at all, by the people, and added that amount to their taxes, it should, now that the conflict is past and the white dove of peace is hovering over a reunited, happy, and prosperous country, be restored to the treasuries of the several States that contributed it, to lessen the amount of taxes in the future.

The State of Ohio on January 14, 1885, memorialized this Congress to pass a bill to remit the balance due from States in arrears and to reimburse the States for amounts paid by them.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] as much of my time as he wishes to occupy.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted to me in this discussion I can do no more than state the position I occupy upon the bill before the House.

By enactment of Congress approved in March, I believe, 1883, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States was authorized to pay to the State of Georgia $35,500. When the State of Georgia applied for that money the United States Treasury officials refused to pay it, but proposed to apply it to a claim said to be due from the State of Georgia to the Government of the United States. This bill is one intended to prevent that adjustment, and any other like it, if any other exists.

There may be two questions in this case, one of law and the other of policy. I desire first to state the question of law involved. It is a cold, clear question of law. There is no place for any political or other antagonism or sympathy.

The Government of the United States owes Georgia $35,500. It is claimed that Georgia owes the Government of the United States a greater sum. Is this a fact? If it is not a fact, then, no one can deny, this measure ought to pass so far as Georgia is concerned. I say unhesitatingly—I say from examination, I say from what I believe to be my knowledge of the law as connected with this case—that Georgia owes the Government of the United States nothing by virtue of the legislation referred to as the legislation of 1861. Nor do other States, as States, that come within the category of this bill. If there is no debt then from Georgia due by it to the United States, there should be no set-off. I purpose only to state that proposition.

Now, there is nothing claimed of such State but that which arises under the law of 1861, by which it was attempted to raise an annual direct tax of $20,000,000 per year. That law provided not for assessments for one year, but it was a continuous law, providing a direct tax of $20,000,000, apportioned among the States in proportion to population, without limit as to time. But this part of the law was repealed at a subsequent session of Congress. I will not inquire whether Congress, under the Constitution, had power to make a State its debtor; I will only answer Congress did not attempt to make a State its debtor in this act of 1861. It was a law providing for a direct tax among the States. It is a very long law, comprising more than sixty sections. As was said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] the other day, the law provided the whole machinery for the collection of that money and did not provide State machinery. It provided United States machinery. It was solely a law to be operated by agents of the United States. It was a direct tax upon the people of the United States apportioned among the States according to the ratio of population. The assessor, the collector, the provision of liens, the sale of real estate and personal property, all were to be done through the agency of the United States and not through the agency of any State.

It was not called a debt of the State, it did not progress as though it was a debt of the State, but simply this power of direct taxation was applied in this way or sought to be applied.

Now, it may be—I have heard it argued here—that the course which Congress took was outside of its power under the Constitution. Admitting that, if you please, the admission amounts to this only, that then there is no indebtedness of any kind even from the people of Georgia. One other fact, Mr. Speaker. A provision was included in this law by which an inducement was held out to the different States to make it a State debt or State obligation, and not an individual burden. It was provided in this law itself that such States as would assume the amount of the indebtedness and make it a State obligation within a limited time should have a credit of 15 per cent. upon the whole amount of the tax assessed against the State. It was also provided that those States who would assume it as the debt of the State within a certain other limited time should receive a credit of 10 per cent. on the total amount. Neither the States nor the Congress understood it then to be a State indebtedness. But, says the gentleman from Iowa, tell me under what authority of the Constitution could this be assumed if it was not a debt? Perhaps none. But it still goes to this point, that the Congress did not understand it to be a State debt, did not regard it as an obligation of the State, nor was it so understood by the States themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated simply this plain legal proposition, and have stated the facts in regard to that enactment. It did not seek, it did not intend, nor did it impose a State obligation; and while it has been suggested that it is difficult to see the difference between the obligation of the people of the State and the obligation of the State itself, there is no such difficulty in my mind any more than there is a difference between a corporation and the stockholders of that corporation. The interests of these parties are not identical—the interests of the individual and of the State—unless it should be that the precise manner of taxation, the precise thing taxed, should be in the same ratio, on the same basis, under this law of 1861 and under the State law, which was not true. So I say that as a matter of law there can not be and never ought to have been in any case any legal offset; and I say that believing I speak the exact truth in regard to what the law is.

I do not deny that the imposition of the tax was legal under the decision of the Supreme Court or without it under the authority of the Constitution.

Now a second proposition, and that is, that this tax ought not, in my judgment, to be collected in this way anyhow. It can not be collected in this way if this legal proposition be correct. An attempt to collect it might succeed in confiscating the debt we owe to the State of Georgia; but it never would be in the mind of a lawyer a collection of a debt, but the confiscation of credits, and that is all there is of it. There has never been anything else in it so far as it has been enforced heretofore, and it makes no difference what political feeling might induce me to do. I am not so made that, standing here as a legislator, I can trample by my vote under foot the law and the Constitution of my country.

But this law was found in less than a year to have been a mistake. Many of the States, for the purpose of getting the advantage of the inducement held out to them of a deduction as provided in the law, assumed the indebtedness as a State obligation, and paid the tax with those deductions. The law was repealed so far as subsequent action was concerned; and no administration up to this day has attempted to collect any of these debts since. Nay, more, sir, the machinery provided by that law for its enforcement was never appointed. No one existing in this House or in this country expects to collect the balance of the millions that are now due under that enactment. There should be no trap set by which, when States become creditors of the General Government, that credit may be wiped out by springing the trap set by it, while at the same time there is no intention to enforce the law honestly and squarely by the collection of this debt. It may, sir, be collected to-day. Every dollar the State of Georgia owes may be collected. Our President may appoint his assessors and collectors and he may force by distress and by sale of real estate in Georgia the collection of the amount of this tax. Does anybody ask it? Have the Republican administrations gone forward in that direction? I say no. The fact is that as we do not intend to collect it nobody desires the collection. What then? There is but one way in justice out of this matter. Not one dollar of it should be collected forcibly from the State of Georgia, from Ohio, or Colorado, or any other State. But I do claim, sir, that this tax should be wholly repaid or wholly collected; and as it can not and will not be collected, I am intending, if possible, to say to-day that the tax already paid by the States shall be repaid to them, as it honestly should be.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. If that be the gentleman's position, why not vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], which does exactly that thing?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I have not said whether I will vote for that amendment. I do not know what it is. But I say, behind that, what is sufficient for me to control my vote in this case, there is no place for offset; there is no offset to have this applied to. There is no legal obligation on the part of Georgia to pay the Government of the United States one single dollar growing out of the legislation of 1861. Any man that will go into that Library and take up the Statutes at Large of 1861, I do not care whether he is a lawyer or not, I will venture my reputation as a man on the assertion that he will say when he is through that there never was an intention of making that a debt against the State of Georgia, nor was there ever such an effect worked out by that statute. And so, standing right there, I am fully able to say I will support this bill; and when another comes for that other purpose, just and fair and honest as it is, then I will give it my most enthusiastic support.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. When that direct tax of 1861 was laid upon the States——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. It never was.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Well, it was apportioned to the States, was it not?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. It was apportioned among the people of the States.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Was the entire tax apportioned against the States which were then in their normal relations to the Federal Government?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. It was apportioned among the people of the States and Territories regardless of any internal commotion.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And then the proper proportion of it was made an obligation against the State or people of Georgia?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Against the people of Georgia in their individual capacity; a provision was made for liens on their lands, not liens on the property of Georgia.

Mr. CUTCHEON. In other words, was it not a tax on the people of Georgia as much as on the people of Ohio?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Yes. But what does all this mean? What is behind it?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Have not those States which were in normal relations to the Federal Government paid their proportions?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. That is not true as to all of them. Colorado has not paid. But, if so, it simply comes to the other point, that you ought to pay it back, as you do not collect the balance. But it does not go to this point, that you shall make a legal obligation where you know one never existed, because it may be your people at home are making a clamor about it.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I am occupying another gentleman's time.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to say——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I decline to yield. A "desire to say" is different from a "desire to ask."

Mr. CULBERSON. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MILLS). The gentleman from Texas has forty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CULBERSON addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this issue hinges upon one single question, and that is, whether the tax levied under the act of 1861 was chargeable to the State or not. If that tax, as levied under the act of 1861, was chargeable to a State, then of course any debt owed by the United States to a State might be set off against the charge under that law against a State. But if it were not chargeable against a State, then of course it can not be set off.

Was it chargeable against a State? That question has been so well stated and argued by my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] this morning that it is not necessary for me to go over the ground again.

That the direct tax of 1861 levied under the apportionment clause of the Constitution was a tax levied upon real estate, upon lands and buildings, is perfectly clear from the act itself and from the discussions which took place in reference to it in both Houses on the passage of the act. It was said at the time by Mr. Stevens and by Mr. Bingham and others that it was a tax on land, and that a direct tax could only be levied upon land.

In the very nature of things it could not be levied upon the State itself, for the State has little or no property upon which to levy a tax. It is true you might levy it upon the State-house and other State property; but what would it amount to? In fact the law of 1861, as did all other laws imposing direct taxes, provided that all State property should be exempt from taxation.

The Government provided the machinery to collect the tax directly from the individual, and I maintain if the United States Government were now to proceed to collect that tax it would proceed to collect it from the owners of the land, those who held the land, which was a subject of taxation when the tax was levied. The whole question, I say again, hinges on that one fact, whether it was a charge or could be a charge against the State under the Constitution or against the individual.

I do not care, Mr. Speaker, to argue the question further, as it would be only traveling over the same ground which has been so thoroughly gone over by other gentlemen who have preceded me in this discussion

Mr. RANNEY addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, the time when, according to an understanding with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON], the consideration of this subject was to be suspended for to-day has now arrived. But if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANNEY] wants only a few minutes to conclude, perhaps an agreement may be made with the gentleman from Illinois to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The time assigned for the consideration of this subject to-day by order of the House has now expired.

Mr. RANNEY. How much of my time remains?

The SPEAKER. One half-hour. The gentleman will be entitled to occupy the floor for that time when the subject is resumed.

Mr. RANNEY. It is not very material to me whether I go on now or at another time, although I would prefer to finish to-day.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from Illinois consents that if the gentleman from Massachusetts wants only a few minutes more, he may go on and finish now.

Mr. RANNEY. I do not wish to give up any part of my time; but I may finish in half the time I am entitled to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be entitled to the floor when the subject is resumed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the agreement to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 382) to authorize the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, Ark., to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock.

It further announced the passage of the following bills and joint resolution; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 753) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon;

A bill (S. 1120) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Omaha National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.;

A bill (S. 1394) to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property; and

Joint resolution (S. R. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla.

TAXATION FRACTIONAL PARTS OF A GALLON OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits, on which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not wish to lose my right, but am willing to yield until gentlemen so desiring it shall present the silver lining to this fog. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Gold lining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] reserved his remaining time?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] had the floor and yielded to a motion that the committee rise on yesterday, and is therefore entitled to the floor this morning.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Chairman, it may be a humiliating confession, and one perhaps dangerous to make, yet I am constrained to the belief that there are at least two subjects which the average Congressman is not unduly qualified to handle: one of them is the tariff, and the other is the silver question. At first blush it would seem that there was nothing inflammatory in the associations and suggestions of topics so frigid as these, but the discussions in this body have clearly shown that both the tariff and the silver question have been idealized by their respective champions, who rush to the defense of high or low duties, of white or yellow metal, with all the chivalrous ardor of Don Quixote himself. As if the inherent difficulties of the subject were not sufficient, the most discursive flights are taken into neighboring fields, and the whole economy of the universe beaten up and explored in search of a simple truth that lies at our own doors and has never left home.

The particular subject before us just now is the continued coinage of the standard silver dollar under the authority of the Bland act, and in order to understand the question it is necessary that we should be informed as to the origin, scope, and purposes of this measure. The question is not whether universal monometallism is better than universal bimetallism, nor whether a local double standard can be maintained in the face of a prevailing single standard among the great commercial countries of the world, nor, as I apprehend it, whether bondholders shall be paid in one currency or another; still less whether there is not some inherent divinity about silver which should hedge it in against the progressive encroachments of the rival metal. The question simply is, shall the Bland act be repealed and the President's wise recommendation adopted?

It is well known that prior to 1873 silver, however limited in amount and restricted in practice to subsidiary uses, was one of the recognized monetary standards of value—not merely the handmaid of gold, but its wedded partner, and at times, measured by bullion value, its better half. At this period silver dropped out of the coinage, some say by a trick, or, as my distinguished friend from Iowa phrases it, by stealth, others by accident; and this banishment continued until the 28th day of February, 1878, nearly eight years ago, when with great éclat the dollar of the fathers was recalled from exile and restored to his ancient possessions. The restoration, however, was not unconditional, but, on the contrary, was clogged with restrictions, which give color at least to the suspicion that the original sentence of banishment was not without reason and necessity. As the law stood prior to 1873 the owner of silver bullion could take it to the mints of the United States and there have it coined into current money of the country upon precisely the same terms on which gold bullion was received.

By the act of 1878 he can do no such thing. He can not carry a pound of it and receive coin in return. The mints are absolutely closed to him, but are as wide open to the coinage of gold bullion as ever. I pause here to ask the question, why this difference? Why is it that the coinage of gold is free and the coinage of silver not free? The Bland act—the very act upon which all this discussion turns—must answer the question. By the terms of that act, as is well known, the United States is required to purchase for coinage not less than two millions of silver bullion nor more than four per month. Consider for a moment the significance of this strange and, as far as I am advised, exceptional, and indeed I may say phenomenal, provision.

It in the first place establishes an inequality between the two precious metals by permitting one to be freely coined at the option of the owner, with no limitation as to quantity except that which nature herself determines, and excludes the other except so far as a partial market is created for it by the terms of the act. In the second place it leaves a tremendous margin for the operation of a discretionary power in the Secretary of the Treasury, who is required to make the purchase, and which power is already claimed to have been abused, and which is certainly liable to still more dangerous abuse in view of not improbable contingencies. The power to coin at discretion twenty-eight or fifty-six millions of dollars per annum, worth in actual value 20 cents less than in legal-tender function, must, I think, on all sides be conceded a dangerous one; but such was the state of opinion when this act was passed between the extreme silver propagandists and their more moderate brethren, modified by the cooler judgment of men who accepted the whole scheme as a dangerous experiment with the circulating medium, that it is probable the purchasing provision was adopted as a compromise.

At the same time it is obvious that this power in friendly hands could be exercised so as to absorb the whole domestic yield of silver bullion which for the year 1885 has been estimated at, say, $46,000,000. So that the result would be about the same as if the coinage of silver was made free.

Assuming that this yield of silver is to continue at the same rate, there is nothing between the country and the equivalent of free silver coinage except the discretion of an official and the uncertainties of a Presidential election. Perhaps this will account for the tenacity with which the silver men, as they are called, hold on to an act which upon its face is an impeachment of the wisdom of free coinage, and a legislative assertion, by implication at least, that there was and is strong ground for making a distinction between gold and silver.

No man can say how this discretion as to the amount of silver bullion to be purchased will be exercised by the future Secretaries of the Treasury; but however it may be used, within the monthly prescribed limits, it is very certain that the advocates of silver gave up their whole case when they consented to accept, in lieu of the natural law of supply, a purely conventional limitation the value of which was made still further dependent upon the exercise of a very liberal discretion. I can understand and appreciate the consistency of a man like my honorable friend General WARNER, of Ohio, who holds that by some happy accident, or by some preordained arrangement of Providence, the precious metals, as gold and silver have been called in all tongues and in all ages of the world's history, naturally take their place in the current transactions of men as the two instruments better adapted than any others as a measure of value and as the means of exchange, and that any attempt, therefore, to tamper with this principle of natural selection or Providential decree by the substitution of a limited purchase of one or the other of the metals for the purpose of coinage is a revolution that digs at the very foundation of things, and sooner or later will cover us with disgrace and disaster.

I can understand and appreciate the force of reasoning which carries a thinker like Cernuschi or Chapman to the conclusion that the bimetallic standard based upon the free coinage of both metals is a necessary condition to restored commercial prosperity now languishing the world over. But hump-backed monometallism, as the great Frenchman himself has not inaptly termed it, or the limping standard, with no sense of security upon either leg, is an anomaly which has neither logic nor symmetry to sustain it. I say, then, to the advocates of silver, follow your leaders and boldly repudiate the false position in which you have been placed by the Bland act for the last eight years; trample under foot the delusion that one of the great money metals of the world, coequal in use, dignity, and power with its helpmeet, can be degraded into servitude, or sent, like Hagar, into the wilderness; take the stand which logic, experience, and all the associations which spring out of a venerable antiquity reaching back to the cradle of the race require, and demand for silver its instant, full, and complete rehabilitation.

Does any son of Demetrius pause at this suggestion and grow "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought?" Are the enemies of the gold bugs, the sharks, and the pirates afraid to take the position where reason, principle, and precedent alike place them? Here upon this advanced line, if they had had the courage of their convictions, they would have taken their stand in 1878. Has there been nothing since in the malign operation of an act contradictory alike of history and sound monetary economy which has taught them that the next best thing to a tenacious adherence to principle in the first instance is an immediate return to it with the renewed and indignant devotion of a true friend who in a weak moment has been surprised into unintentional betrayal. Think of it, gentlemen, only two hundred and twenty millions coined in the last eight years, when, if you had been true to yourselves, you ought to have had at least five hundred or perhaps one thousand millions. All of this vast sum might have been snugly stored in the Government vaults, kegs piled upon kegs, such a sight as Ali Baba and his forty thieves or Clive and Pizarro never beheld, and all waiting to crush the bloated bondholder, like the Roman maiden who fell a victim to the weight of her own ornaments.

But, sir, free coinage was not established in 1878, nor does any one with serious hopes of passing it expect that such a measure will find acceptance in 1886. On the contrary, limited coinage was the order of the day then, and limited coinage is the order of the day now, so that the recommendation of the President is not for the suspension of coinage, but for the suspension of the partial, limited, and limping coinage authorized by the Bland act. If free coinage had been resumed in 1878, and the recommendation was to suspend it, then the advocates of bimetallism, and their opponents, would have had a square issue upon which to arrange their order of battle; but in its present state, I contend, the real question in this case is whether we shall get rid of a measure which is neither fish nor flesh, neither sea nor good dry land. The question, as I look at it, is not whether we shall demonetize silver, but whether we shall repeal a mischievous act, which in principle is itself a demonetization of silver, by a strong irrecognition of its right to free and unlimited coinage.

The debate in either House has proceeded upon this theory of the state of the question. No one has defended the Bland act, except so far as to urge that a repeal of it without anything being substituted in its stead might have a tendency to further depreciate the white metal, and all seem to have agreed that the real question in its last analysis is whether the resumption of the free coinage of silver by the United States would be good for the country or not.

If the Bland act as enforced by the present and past administrations has any friends they have not shown their hands; and I suppose that all true friends of silver, especially those who have espoused the cause from sentimental grounds, and love the dollar because its antetype once jingled in the pockets of their daddies, hold to the true orthodox faith that gold and silver as the parents of the coin of the Constitution ought to be admitted into the mints without restriction and upon equal terms. Treating the question then as a proposition not to suspend the operation of a limited measure affecting the coinage, which apparently has the approval of neither friend nor foe, but as a move in the direction of a full restoration of silver to the privilege of the mint, or an absolute refusal of it, I have very decided convictions.

Before proceeding to state what those convictions are, I desire to call attention to another curious anomaly which this question presents. Most of the righteous gentlemen here who are unwilling to let slip the opportunity of paying debts in a depreciated coin, and who naturally denounce the lenders of money as an inferior and degraded class, not worthy of comparison with the great race of men, as Lamb describes the borrowers, in the person of Ralph Bigod, are to a great extent believers in the practical application of the doctrine of free trade. They believe in the practical realization, at this day and time, and in this country, of that expansive and cosmopolitan principle which recognizes the commercial brotherhood of the race and the freest interchange of commodities.

They say a man is outside of the Christian pale who can not or does not take this comprehensive view of humanity. They are opposed, therefore, to the intervention by Government for the protection of our industries, believing that what can not stand the shock of competition in the world's markets had better go down. But what is this Government purchase of silver every month but the worst and extremest form of protection that was ever devised. It is conceded on all hands that if the Government was not a constrained purchaser in the market the price of silver bullion, now falling, would still further decline. It is contended that silver is one of our great products, although it has been shown that the amount annually taken out of the earth does not equal the value annually taken out of the hens' nests in the country. Why not let it stand alone, and let the silver producers get for their product in the world's market what they can? The fact is the Bland act creates a market for at least twenty-four millions' worth of bullion every year, upon which the producer can rely with absolute certainty; and if there is any other product in this country which receives the same kind of protection, I have not been informed of its existence.

Consider for a moment what it costs the tax-payer to maintain the coinage of these silver tokens? The interest on the public debt amounts annually in round numbers to $50,000,000, and the civil expenses of the Government to about $24,000,000. The coinage tax, then, is equal to one-half of the public charge for interest, and is a million dollars more than the cost of maintaining the civil machinery of this vast Government. Not only is this so, but as I look at it there is a clear loss on the coinage by the difference in real value between the money given in payment for the silver bullion and the coined product of the purchase. I know that there are some philosophers who contend that the Government is a gainer and not a loser by the operation.

But let us see. The silver bullion out of which were coined in December last $215,000,000 cost the Government $188,000,000, paid in the equivalent of gold. Measured by this standard, this nominal stamped sum of $215,000,000 is reduced one-fifth; that is to say, by $43,000,000, leaving as the result of the outlay of $188,000,000 only $172,000,000; or, in other words, showing a clear loss of $16,000,000. Now, in the language of one of our free-trade brothers, whose soul delights in contemplating the untold millions which could be saved the innocent tax-payer if the protectionist robbers would only commute their bounties for a fixed sum, I ask the question, would it not be far better to buy outright the silver producer's plant and make him whole for all his outlay, with a considerable percentage added for profit, than to take his bullion and coin it at this terrible loss to the country?

But, passing from this, why is it that the free coinage of legal-tender silver is inadmissible in this country in the present state of the monetary question? Simply because we should be issuing a dollar made of a metal discredited and discarded elsewhere for monetary purposes, the only ability of which to circulate here is acquired from its legal-tender function. It is said in answer to this, that this is a new and a big country, and that it matters but little whether we are in a state of helpless dislocation or harmonious union with other countries, that we will take care of domestic exchanges in our own coin, and settle foreign balances with securities or products or in some other way that will not require the use of the money metals.

This is a beautiful theory, and in the features which contemplate a self-sustaining, complacent isolation, protected by an insurmountable Chinese wall, ought to be positively enchanting to the free-trader. I do not deny that it is possible. Austria has tried it and found that it could be done. But her silver florin worth 50 cents has gradually depreciated to about 37, and her gold pieces have migrated elsewhere. But paper is plenty and dirty. There is no reason in the nature of things why this country, under the benign influence of monetary protection jealously enforced by the apostles of free trade, should not get along upon a silver basis, but the practical question which a wise and patriotic legislator asks is not upon how little a nation may subsist but how much power and dignity he may command for its support.

The Southern confederacy got along on shinplasters when a man took his basket to market to carry his money and his pocketbook to bring back his provisions. The United States did still better with the battle-born and blood-stained greenback, and old Frederick the Great got along on nothing during the seven years' war but gunpowder, but in neither case has it been recorded that there was an even healthful development of the body-politic. It is said that the maintenance of a metallic currency, the stamped pieces of which differ as to actual and nominal value, can be continued at the pleasure of the Government by the simple device known as legal tender, and that this vicious and depreciated money will not drive out of circulation coin intrinsically more valuable. Voluminous tabular statements are exhibited showing that gold so far from leaving the country has been pouring in in a Pactolian stream ever since 1878.

That may be true, but will the experience of any man confirm the statement that gold circulates from hand to hand, and pocket to pocket, with half the freedom it was wont to pass just after the period of resumption? Gold will go out of the country as rapidly as it came in, on the ebb tide of a failing exchange, but the question I ask is, and on the concession too that the tables are correct, where is the gold, why has it disappeared entirely from the tills of merchants and the pockets of the people? Why is it that a gold piece is as rare now as it ever was at high-water mark in the greenback deluge? Unquestionably it seems to me because the simple instinct of selfishness, sometimes called Gresham's law, which teaches a man to hold on to that which is more and to part with that which is less valuable, provided he can accomplish the same object, is already beginning to work. Gold is not yet at a premium, but you may depend upon it there are hundreds and thousands of men who are hoarding it up against the day when it will command a premium.

I hold in my hand the last estimate made by the Director of the Mint of the coin circulation of the United States, an estimate which is brought down to January 1, 1886.

JAMES P. KIMBALL,
Director of the Mint.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT, January 30, 1886.

By this estimate it appears that there are gold coins in the United States worth $553,810,148. But where are they? The national banks have $156,353,592. In other banks and private hands there are $290,766,388. But most significant and striking of all is the estimate which credits State banks, trust companies, and savings-banks with $31,255,789. Now, examine the other side of the column. The national banks have only $6,940,628 standard silver dollars inclusive of silver certificates. State banks, trust companies, and savings-banks have not a single dollar. I will insert this table as a part of my remarks for the purpose of showing that not only the national banks but those depositories of money where the enormous responsibility of the trust induces the most cautious vigilance in the preservation of the fund, have already begun to hoard gold against the evil day which they at least, whatever may be the buncombe opinion of this body, believe to be inevitable. No banks, no holder of money who receives a gold dollar will pay it out again if he can possibly avoid it, and the tendency of all the discussions that take place here is not to relax but strengthen the grip on gold.

Silver or its paper representative still passes in the daily exchanges as the equivalent of gold, but how long can this parity be maintained in the face of a widening gap as to bullion value upon the strength merely of the Government fiat? It floats to-day, sustained by favorable conditions of credit, but is there no point in the scale of depreciation to which it must eventually sink and be taken at its real and not nominal value? I put this question: Given a piece of metallic money—silver, if you please—which has depreciated 20 per cent. in bullion as compared with stamped value, with the prospect of further depreciation by an impetus in a sort of geometrical ratio of increase, vires acquirit eundo, how long can the fiat of the Government sustain such a doubtful character; or, rather, how long will honest folk associate in such doubtful company?

So far the association has been maintained, but is it reasonable or prudent to infer that this companionship will continue indefinitely? I think not. The history of legal tender is involved in great obscurity, and one of the most industrious economists in this country, Mr. Edward Atkinson, has stated that he could get no reliable account of its origin after a very diligent search himself and inquiring of lawyers who might be supposed to have more or less familiarity with the subject. I have made myself some investigation with a view to exploring the sources of this mysterious faculty which by some trick or magic converts fiction into fact, but have met with the same failure as Mr. Atkinson.

It is a point of no moment except as a matter of scientific curiosity, as the Supreme Court of the United States has laid down the doctrine in very broad terms that it was within the constitutional competence of Congress to impart this faculty to any substance upon which it chose to impress the stamp of sovereignty. This decision determined that the promise of the United States printed on paper could be made a legal tender, and for a while, if I remember, the promissory notes of the Government floated at par or nearly so in the second year of the war; but they were soon at a discount, and gold ceased to circulate as money and was sold at a heavy premium as merchandise.

It is claimed by the advocates of silver that the standard dollar will not meet with the same fate, because it is made of a substance the monetary use of which is based on intrinsic value, represented in part by its scarcity, in part by the cost of production, and in part by its universal acceptance, until within late years, as one of the standard money metals of the world. This is true to a certain extent, but does any one doubt that there must come a time in the depreciation of this coin when the legal-tender faculty will be no more able to lift it up to a par with a metal intrinsically more valuable, and at the same time maintaining its commercial integrity, than it had power to sustain the waning credit of the greenbacks engaged in the same unequal contest?

Past contracts of course will be satisfied in this coin at its face and not its intrinsic value, but as to all future contracts the creditor will be careful to protect himself against such a contingency. But what shall be said of the daily exchanges between man and man? Is there any magic in legal tender to make a man sell his goods at a price fixed by the buyer? Is there anything in this faculty which can prevent the butcher or the baker from saying to his customer, I want so much for this in gold or its equivalent, and so much more if you pay me in silver? Can the lender be restrained from saying to his borrower, you can have my money at so much per cent. interest if paid in gold, and so much greater rate if paid in silver, and you can not get it at all unless you agree to return the principal in gold?

But a boisterous claim, smacking at times of the demagogue, is made, that the natural expulsion of silver as a money metal in this country, by the force of edicts in other countries, over which we have no control, is the deliberate result of a wicked conspiracy of the creditor class to plunder their debtors, and that in this conspiracy the individual and corporate holders of Government bonds maintain an easy lead. It is nothing to the purpose that this Government made two ineffectual attempts, by commissioners appointed for the purpose, to persuade Germany that she had done a very unhandsome thing by silver, to convince England that she had grown rich on the wrong monetary basis, and to induce the members of the Latin Union to open their mints to the discarded metal. Commercial Europe in the main, with the exception of Italy, Austria-Hungary, and Russia, where the financial dominates the monetary question, has shut the door fast in the face of silver, and surely justification enough could be found for a similar policy on the part of the United States, and especially so by the representatives of the dominant party without subjecting the President to the very serious charge of conspiring with the moneyed classes of the country against the innocent and helpless debtor.

But it is said that the demonetization of silver abroad was accomplished by despotic power in the interest of the same designing, greedy class. This is about as logical and true as most of the statements of this kind, and suggests the question at once why should republican France and imperial Germany alike discredit silver and autocratic Russia hold on to it?

But let me remind gentlemen whose zeal possibly outruns their discretion, that the bondholder will be the very last to be affected by the unlimited coinage of silver. There is pending a proposition now which requires the Secretary to redeem called bonds in silver dollars. I do not suppose that means an actual delivery to each bondholder of the veritable dollars themselves, but that they shall be paid in representative money of which silver is the basis. Well, suppose that should be done, who would be hurt by it? Not the individual holder of the bond, for silver being still the equal of gold he would convert the money into other property and be as well off as before. Would it hurt the national banks, against which all the heathen seem to rage and the people imagine a vain thing?

I can not see how they would be injured, at least enough to afford any real pleasure to a stalwart enemy of the bondocracy, and I am entirely at a loss to know who would be benefited even if the injury was wrought to his heart's content. Nothing seems to excite the ire of these gentlemen so much as the fact that Government 4 percents, not redeemable until 1907, are at the enormous premium of 24 per cent. They seem to think that the bondholder gets that in some mysterious way, or, at all events, that is the idea to which they attempt to give circulation among the people. Is it necessary to say that this is a premium which the bondholder who now becomes a purchaser pays? If he holds on to his bond until maturity he will have lost the interest on the premium, and then, if the bond is paid, will lose the premium too.

An original holder will get back what he put in the investment, and it is only original holders or intermediate purchasers who have sold and taken advantage of the advanced rate in the premium who will reap the benefit of it. But the bondholder as an investor, the individual, or corporation, who is usually characterized as bloated, the fixed and not merely sporadic and occasional incubus upon society, he will take nothing by the premium, but in many cases will be a loser. But however that may be, bloated as he is, you must let him enjoy his inflation until 1907—twenty-one years before you can prick him with your silver bodkin.

It is possible that siver will have so far depreciated by that time that this unreasoning hostility may feed fat its revenge in paying the bondholder, be he rich or poor, man or woman, soldier or widow, or whether it be a national or a savings bank, in metallic tokens miscalled money, of little or no value. Gentlemen who are preaching this crusade against bondholders, as if they were a fixed, unvarying class, and all of them wealthy, should remember that the obligations of the Government are continually changing hands, that the savings of the poor are invested in them as well as the accumulations of the rich, and that the Almighty himself seems to have interposed a barrier against this attempt to array class against class by a nice blending of interests which can not be separated without mutual injuries.

But there is another class of bondholders: that class which holds the world in bonds, without whom the world's machinery would hang listless upon its axles, and yet who seem to be in vinculis themselves; the bondman instead of the bondholder, the uneasy captive in a world of which he is the conqueror. What will you do with this creditor class? Tread softly here, you honest advocates of an honest dollar worth 79 cents, for the ground all about you is treacherous and slippery. I repeat the question, in what sort of a currency do you propose to pay that class of creditors, more numerous and more important than all the bondholders in the two hemispheres, for the labor and sweat which in some employment or other they are daily selling from sun to sun? Labor comes before capital. Capital must ever be debtor to labor. In what medium of exchange does capital propose to discharge that debt?

The remuneration of labor is poor enough now, heaven knows. You say that it is inequitable to change the value of the currency between the date of the contract and its performance. I ask you how you propose to discharge the contracts between labor and capital during the long intervals that prices are adjusting themselves to the new condition created by a false money? No class in society has the same interest in a stable medium of exchange as the men who toil with their hands. The wage-earner sells for cash, and, as experience has proven, is the very last person to get the benefit of an advance in price, which always follows as the inevitable consequence of a depreciated currency. He is not only compelled to sell for cash, but he finds himself in a market where the sellers outnumber the buyers, and is mostly compelled to part with his product under conditions that closely resemble a forced sale.

To pay him, therefore, at rates established before the depreciation began in a medium the purchasing power of which has been reduced by a rise in prices all along the scale of subsistence, is to inflict a great wrong upon the innocent and helpless for which even revenge upon the wicked bondholder will not atone. Not to go back over ground already traversed, permit me to put forward a suggestion at this point which has already been made with more or less force. The advocates of silver have made it plain in all their speeches that the oppressive plundering, I had almost said thieving creditor class, constituted the objective point of the silver craze, and that bimetallism or unimetallism was a secondary consideration. As far as the public debt is concerned, I suppose the whole of it now redeemable, or shortly maturing, could be paid in silver without damage to the creditor except the inconvenience perhaps of handling the money upon the supposition that he would be paid in dollars instead of their representative paper equivalents.

The vast bulk of this debt is not redeemable, as I have shown, until 1907, and the high premium upon this class of Government bonds, varying within the smallest fractional limits from day to day, conclusively shows that these bloated holders are not very much concerned about the action of this body. I do not believe that the owners of either class of bonds will be injured to the extent of a farthing, but I do believe that the laboring classes of this country will receive a serious injury whenever the time comes when gold, like a reluctant lover who has already said many farewells, comes in truth and reality to wave his parting and final adieu to silver. That time has not come yet; it may be postponed far beyond the period fixed for it by reasonable apprehension; it may possibly be put off until our Government vaults are overrun with dollars as the Bishop of Hatto's castle on the Rhine swarmed with rats; but surely all experience will be at fault if the attempt to float a circulation by Government fiat at a par, out of harmony with the currencies of the world, and in flat contradiction of its own actual value as distinguished from its stamped pretension, does not sooner or later produce that derangement between values and exchanges the disastrous effect of which, by the force of a law that Almighty wisdom can alone penetrate, is thrust upon the laboring man first.

I have said elsewhere, and I repeat it here, that never by vote or voice of mine will I willingly hurt a hair on the head of labor, and although I regard that man as a demagogue who attempts to array one class of citizens against another, and none the less a demagogue because this array happens to dress upon sectional lines, yet still I avow myself here, as far as my humble insight goes, the friend of the bondmen and the bondwomen, ay, and the bondchildren, that anomalous class who are both creditor and debtor, creditor for wages and debtor, God help us, for the privilege of work, potentially the most independent and practically the most dependent class in society.

Gold can take care of itself. Congress, indignant at the discount with which the greenback was received, attempted to levy a thunderbolt at the head of gold during the war. But what was the consequence? The discredit of the paper, confounded with an undue appreciation of the metal, took another fall, like Lucifer. The law was repealed almost in the moment of its enactment. The money-owners have cities of refuge in all the capitals of Europe, in which they find ready access by the purchase of foreign exchange. Capital has a thousand ways of protecting itself, but labor has only one, and that is in a medium of exchange which will always be a fair equivalent for what has been given for it, and the purchasing power of which is permanently based upon fact and not upon fiction.

I commend to the consideration of the goldphobists that there are other classes to be thought of in this country than the bondholder and the creditor. A favorite argument with the silver protectionist is that free coinage is necessary to sustain the volume of the currency at a point where it will satisfy the normal demands of the people. A great deal is said about the circulation per capita in France and other countries, and the record is loaded with very interesting and doubtless instructive tables upon this subject. Demand is made that the 72,000,000 of silver dollars not in circulation and not represented by certificates shall be permitted to overflow the Government dam and enrich and fertilize the arid and waste places in the United States.

One gentleman of overwrought imagination in a moment of high poetical frenzy revels in the vision of a cyclone, penetrating to the vaults and sucking up into its bosom the sunless treasure, and thence scattering it, in a fertilizing shower, broadcast over the country. It would be better thus, he says, than to lie stagnant where it is, "in cold obstruction and rot." Well suppose the $72,000,000 were distributed by cyclone, and not with the blind rage which usually distinguishes these atmospheric disturbances, setting violently in one direction or the other, but suppose it regulated by an equitable and discriminating justice, so as to shower its bounty upon all sections of the country alike, what would be the final consequence of such a continental windfall? Every dollar of it, by a law as inexorable as the law of gravitation, or as that which directs the course of the trade-winds, would come back into the tax offices and custom-houses and thence pass into the Treasury. There is no need for additional circulation, and particularly of that sort which experience has shown will not circulate.

At times during the past year there has been a surplus of $64,000,000 over legal reserve in the national banks in New York alone, and frequently call-loans were made as low as 2½ per cent. Money can be had on good collateral from 1 to 3 per cent. interest. The amount of bonds surrendered within a very few days amounted to more than $2,000,000 in a single week, showing that circulation to the amount of $1,800,000 had been retired as against about $336,000 that had been issued. Money can be had on good security anywhere and everywhere, and if it commands a higher rate of interest in some sections of the country than in others it is owing not to any fancied scarcity but to conditions which affect credit and confidence and have nothing to do with the quantity or the volume of the currency. All of these arguments were made and exploded in the solid days of greenbacks. But instead of the blizzard distribution of the buzzard dollar [laughter and applause] suppose you undertake the more usual and less violent and perhaps more regular mode of getting the silver into circulation by calling in and paying Government threes in silver, would you be any better off? This silver would fly to the custom-house as naturally as iron filings to a magnet; and, to change the figure, all your dollars which you had gotten out of confinement with so much trouble to yourself and inconvenience to the holder would find themselves, like the discharged bummers from our city jails, snugly back again in their old quarters after a disagreeable outing for a few days.

I have said little or nothing on the abstract question as to whether bimetallism, as it is called, would afford a more covenient and reliable medium of exchange than unimetallism. I have purposely laid this question aside, just as I would the question whether free trade in the abstract would not be more conducive to the country's progress than protection, for the reason that both of them are abstract questions and foreign to the practical consideration of the matter in hand.

If the relative value of silver and gold could be permanently fixed by international agreement, which would also embrace the full remonetization of silver, I have no doubt that such an arrangement would not be prejudicial to the interests of this country; but to attempt it is like grabbing at the moon. It was attempted in 1878, and afterward in 1881, and is still, I believe, the subject of diplomatic negotiation, but all efforts so far to bring it about have proved complete failures. The great apostle of bimetallism himself has said that the suspension of the coinage of silver by the United States would be much more likely to lead to such an agreement than its continued coinage under the provisions of the Bland act. If silver was discredited in the United States, as well as elsewhere, then, if there is anything in the argument that the present world-wide depression is due in part at least to the attack upon silver, this renewed assault from an unexpected quarter would be more likely to bring Europe to its senses than the doubtful position now occupied by this country.

The Bland act, as I understand it, left the hands of its distinguished author as a simple measure for the restoration of silver coinage, and in this form was passed by the House of Representatives. But the Senate added not only the purchasing provision to which allusion has already been made, but all the clauses providing for the establishment of a fixed ratio between gold and silver and the remonetization of silver by means of an international conference. The Bland act, in its naked simplicity, I may say, childlike and bland, could not pass, and these important restrictions were imposed by a cautious and conservative hand, with a view to changing the absolute principle asserted in the bill into a piece of purely tentative and experimental legislation. In other words, construed in the light of the debate at the time of its passage, this is the true meaning of the bill.

The commercial world has demonetized silver—it is for the interest of the United States that it should be remonetized. Still it would be dangerous, in view of its suspension elsewhere, to restore silver to full communion here. We will, therefore, grant it a partial restoration, but will take steps at the same time to win back Europe to the double standard by such persuasion as we can bring to bear and by such apprehension as this limited experiment of ours may create.

The attempt, as every one knows, has failed; and now what would seem to be the dictate of common sense—continue the experiment or stop? Does any gentleman think that if eight years have not brought repentance to Europe then possibly sixteen will? The argument seems to rest upon the rather unstable footing that the continued coinage of a depreciated currency will in some way appreciate the metal out of which the currency is coined; and as the effect of coining 250,000,000, say, in eight years has been to keep silver at a discount of 20 cents on the dollar, the coinage of 500,000,000, or twice that amount, will have the opposite effect of making the dollar worth 100 cents; in other words, the more of a debased currency you put in circulation the more valuable it becomes.

This was not the argument of the Bland act, at least with its Senatorial grafts; but, on the contrary, the contention was that the value of silver depended largely upon its use; that that use in turn could only be established by the consensus of nations, and until a satisfactory international agreement could be had covering the whole subject it would be folly in the United States to enter upon an unlimited coinage. It was not the opinion of the author of the restraining qualifying amendments of that act that the quantity of the dollars could in any way atone for the quality of the material out of which they were made, but he would seem to have been very clearly of the opinion that the fewer we had of them the better it would be for the country.

It was not the opinion then that unlimited coinage here would result in a similar condition across the water, but on the contrary the limited, partial, and unsatisfactory purchasing provision was resorted to for the express purpose of escaping the consequences of unlimited coinage. Now I ask what has happened since to change the opinion then entertained? Is there anything in the present condition of Europe which justifies the belief that in the near or remote future silver will be rehabilitated? Does any one think that free coinage could accomplish here as in Europe what partial coinage has failed to effect?

I hope right here that gentlemen will not forget that the foreign market south and southwest of us is somewhat chimerical. I hope that our free-trade friends at least, who are trying to break down the barriers between us and England, will remember that Great Britain takes about 60 per cent. of our manufactured and agricultural products, and more than the West Indies, Central America, and South America combined, and that to be at war with her in our monetary relations just when the freest commercial intercourse is blossoming white with peace would be a melancholy and inconsequential result.

The proposition is to swap, to exchange product for product, to barter with the first commercial countries of the world and with those where our trade is heaviest, for the purpose of redressing balances in silver with weaker nations with whom our trade is lightest. I must be pardoned for not recognizing the beneficence of such a proposition, although among its incidental blessings should follow the complete destruction of the national banks and their pestilent allies, the bloated bondholders.

In this connection I desire to submit some figures taken from the annual report of the Bureau of Statistics for the year ending June 30, 1885:

	Values.	Per cent. of total.
Exports of domestic merchandise to Europe	$500,768,751	81.30
British North American provinces	34,112,254	4.69
Asia and Oceanica	33,957,625	4.68
South America	26,967,181	3.71
West Indies	24,024,135	3.31
Mexico, Central America, and British Honduras	10,398,272	.43

In other words, nearly 85 per cent. of our exports of domestic merchandise, for which we are now seeking an outlet, go to Europe and the country north and west of us, and to all other countries in the world 15 per cent.

But this is not the whole of the story. The argument is that we ought to build up our trade with the silver nations lying south and west of us. As the silver combination embraces the West and the South, its trading affinity naturally tends to contiguous regions, leaving the North and the East to maintain its fellowship with the countries designated by the same points of the compass. Well, we have had a commission exploring the hidden treasure of this Southern commerce, and the business mind of the country has been on the alert to seize the slightest opportunity for trade in that direction; and what has been the consequence? The following table, exhibiting the comparative values of exports for the years 1884 and 1885, will show with what countries our trade has increased and with what it has fallen off.

From this it will be seen that while our trade with Great Britain and Ireland and with Europe generally has increased, it has fallen off with every state south of us except Uruguay, and that the deficit with Mexico is the greatest of all. It is this comparison which forces the intelligent and sagacious head of the bureau to suggest whether the cultivation of trade with wealthy and powerful nations in whose markets we have already acquired a substantial foothold would not be quite as much to our advantage as new ventures in weaker and untried quarters of the world, a suggestion in which I am sure sensible men will concur, even in the face of reciprocity treaties which generously propose to take everything and give the United States little or nothing in return—a sort of reciprocity which does not reciprocate.

Certain I am that the men who propose to foster closer commercial relations with Great Britain by amendments of our tariff, with a view to an increased export of our manufactured product, which already amounts to 43 per cent. with that empire as against 33 per cent. with the Spanish countries south of us, must see the danger of a permanent dislocation between the currency of commerce and the currency of the Supreme Court. I say this with a reckless indifference not in the least abated by the thought that were Thaddeus Stevens living he would feel a new pang, as the vicarious sufferer, for all the wrongs inflicted by gold upon this poverty-stricken and unhappy country. The gentleman from Iowa has quoted from the prophets; let me attempt to draw inspiration from the same source.

Daniel was once called upon to tell a great king the nature of a forgotten dream and then to interpret its meaning. The prophet declared that the vision which the king had seen in the night, and which he vainly attempted to recall, bodied forth a colossal figure, the head of which was gold, the arms and waist of silver, the rest of the body of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet of iron and clay. A stone cut out of the side of the mountain dashed against this figure and ground it into pieces, and the wind blew it away and it was seen no more.

This tremendous figure does not inaptly represent the progressive growth of monetary evolution, which, from the rudimentary forms of barter, exchange, the mere clay at its feet, has gradually developed along the scale of inferior metals, through iron, copper, and silver, until it has reached its culmination and crown in gold. In this evolution there has been not merely a change of physical form, by which one metal has superseded another, but a differentiation of function, also, by which the primitive faculty of metallic money as exchange has gradually given way to its higher and superior virtue as an instrument for storing value, in the course of which the world's commerce has come to be carried on in great part by a secondary or representative currency.

It may be that there is yet to be a stone cut out of the mountain side by which this old money image will be shattered into pieces and ground into powder, and gold, as the last and perfected stage in the progress of its development, disappear with the baser elements that compose the structure; but until that day comes no forced inversion of parts, no violent subordination of function, can change the eternal law by which the head fitly crowns and dominates the body. Gold, in my opinion, in spite of all your laws, by virtue of a law of its own, will still be king. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my friend from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] who has just taken his seat that there can be no permanent settlement of the money question until gold and silver which have held the place of money metals through all ages are restored to that position again. But while my friend would abandon silver in order that gold may be enthroned as the sole money metal and standard of value, I propose to hold on to what we now have until we can take a step toward the final settlement of this controversy by the restoration of the two metals, with the right to everybody to have either of them converted into money without limit—in other words, restore natural regulation; and I shall favor any measure that leads to this end.

The distinguished economist, M. de Laveleye, began his address on bimetallism before the French Institute in Paris in 1881 with these words:

> "If I venture to speak of money before this assembly, it is to obey the wish of my distinguished and regretted master, Wolowski, who in his last illness wrote me, in a hand already enfeebled: 'My strength is forsaking me; but do you continue to defend our cause, which is the true one.'"

I speak for silver, because I believe it is the side of truth and justice, and that the welfare of the country and the world is inseparably bound up in it.

To secure stability in money has been declared to be the chief end of political economy. To preserve the greatest possible stability in metallic money is the object, and the only legitimate object, of perpetuating the use of both gold and silver as money. They who advocate the demonetization of silver and the establishment of the single gold standard start out on the assumption, as my friend from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] has, that gold by itself constitutes a fixed standard, at least that its value in no wise depends on the concurrent use of silver as money, and that whatever be done with silver it will not affect the value of gold. They must of necessity, start with this assumption or their arguments would break down at the outset. If they admitted that to demonetize silver would alter the value of gold, would make the gold standard a different standard, the monstrous injustice of such an act would become so apparent that no one would enlist in its defense.

But right here lies the root of the evil of monometallism. The fact, the incontrovertible fact, is, that the demonetization of silver, by lessening the quantity of money in the world and increasing the demand for gold, does change the value of gold itself, and thus makes the gold standard a different standard from what it was or would be with silver continued as money concurrently with gold.

If the world's money be taken as $4,000,000,000 of gold, $3,500,000,000 of silver, and $4,500,000,000 of paper, it is plain enough that, if the silver and the paper were destroyed, gold, having three times the work to do, would be enormously increased in value. It is quite apparent, too, that if the silver part were taken away or reduced to a mere subsidiary money, the paper, in order to be kept at a parity with gold, must be greatly reduced in volume.

But for our present argument take only gold and silver. Suppose, instead of being coined separately, these metals had been melted together and coined, as were the electrum coins of ancient Lydia, making $7,500,000,000 of gold-silver coins for the world, would anybody hold that half of such a volume of money might be destroyed or demonetized without appreciating the value of the part remaining? or who would advocate such a step? And yet it can not make the least difference in the world whether the two metals are coined separately or melted together and coined as a compound metal. The mass is the same in either case, and it is the mass of the whole, and not the way it is coined, that determines the value of the whole and of each piece. You can not, therefore, overthrow silver without altering the value of every ounce of gold in the world and of every gold coin.

M. Premiez, in the monetary conference of 1878, said: "Destroy all the silver, and the gold which will remain will be worth as much as the two metals together were before." There is no escaping this conclusion. Then how can it be justified? I hold the gold advocates to this issue, and I hold my friend from Maryland who has just spoken to it. It is for them to answer. They may say it is not proposed to demonetize outright all the silver coins now in existence. I reply that to reduce them to mere subsidiary money, which is proposed, or in any way to abridge the use or shut off the supply of silver for money, increases proportionately the use of gold, and thereby increases its value.

Already an immense change has taken place in the value of gold from this cause. I propose briefly to trace the effect of this change and the further change that is sure to follow every step in the transition from bimetallism to a single gold standard, first on the debts of the world and the cost of governments, and then on production, industries, and labor.

I will take only the debts of countries heretofore bimetallic, or that would be immediately affected by a change to a single gold standard.

THE NATIONAL DEBTS OF EUROPE

alone, according to the Reform Almanac for 1886, amount now to $22,795,000,000. This is the largest aggregate I have seen authoritatively stated. Add to this the national debts of the United States, Canada, and other bimetallic countries, and we get the stupendous aggregate of about $26,000,000,000 as the burden of national debts that weighs down modern nations.

The increase in national debts since 1848 has averaged $500,000,000 a year. Next come which for the United States are given as $1,117,000,000 in 1880, or over $20 per capita. Local public debts of England and Canada, $1,735,000,000. The municipal debts of some large cities are indeed frightful. That of Paris is $420,000,000, New York $150,000,000. Twelve principal cities of Europe show an average of $30 per capita. The debts of some cities in the United States run up to over $100 per capita, and a few to over $200. The total of local debts in the countries whose national debts are given swells the aggregate public indebtedness of these countries to $38,000,000,000, which nearly equals the entire wealth of the United States, and is greater than the value of all the lands of the United States and England together.

No less startling is the mortgage indebtedness of modern countries:

For the United Kingdom it is given at	$8,000,000,000
For Germany	8,500,000,000
For France	3,850,000,000
For Russia	3,250,000,000
For Austria	1,500,000,000
For Italy	2,675,000,000
For other European countries	3,050,000,000
Total	30,825,000,000

The mortgages in the United Kingdom amount to 41 per cent. of the value of all the landed property in the kingdom. Lord Reay puts it at 58 per cent. Samuel Smith places the mortgages of all England at $2,000,000,000, which is nearly 60 per cent. of the value of all the landed property.

Mortgages in Germany amount to 49 per cent. of the value of all the real estate.

We have no statistics in the United States by which to compute the total mortgage indebtedness. In 1880 the Census showed 4,686,187 tenant farmers, and a writer in the January North American says "it is a very rare thing in the newer States to come across a farmer who has not a mortgage, or bill of some kind, coming due on his land." But if the mortgage indebtedness reaches no more per capita here than in England it would amount to $8,200,000,000, which would be 41 per cent. of the true estimated value of all the real estate in 1880. This is about the same as the per capita of the mortgage indebtedness of Europe, and is doubtless a low estimate for this country.

The railway mortgages in the United States in 1885 amounted to $3,750,000,000.

Putting these several forms of indebtedness together—national, State, municipal, and mortgage, not including railroads, and taking no account of private indebtedness other than mortgages—and they aggregate not less than $75,000,000,000, or nearly twice the value of the whole United States, and more than the value of all the lands of Europe and the United States together! Feudalism never approached such dimensions nor attained a tithe of such power. The interest on this vast accumulation of debts at 4 per cent. amounts to $3,000,000,000 per annum, to pay which would require the constant earnings of full one-half of the entire laboring population of the United States. It is pertinent to inquire here who are the

HOLDERS OF THESE NATIONAL DEBTS.

In England 300 persons own $150,000,000 of the national debt; 2,000 persons own $570,000,000, 40,000 persons own $2,000,000,000, and 237,000 out of a population of 36,000,000 own the entire debt.

In the United States, banks, trust, and insurance companies hold $550,000,000 of the national debt; 10,000 persons hold $500,000,000 more, and less than 100,000 out of a population of 57,000,000 own the entire debt. How municipal and mortgage debts are held statistics do not show.

England, it is true, since 1816 has had a gold standard. But her relation to the Continent has been such that she has been practically as much under a bimetallic valuation as France or any other continental nation. So that every dollar of this staggering weight of debt has been created by a scale of valuation made of the two metals combined, and not of one alone. It was created on the basis of both metals as money, and with the right to expect that both would remain money metals, available always for the discharge of debts. And does not simple justice require that debts should be paid by the same scale by which they were created? States have created or authorized these debts and have provided machinery for enforcing payment. To alter the standard of payment after the creation of obligations can no more be justified than to alter the pound weight or the bushel measure; and an alteration outright would never be tolerated. It must be done in some indirect and obscure manner, as by altering the value of money.

On this point, J. R. McCullough says:

> Directly to alter the terms of contracts between individuals would be too bare-faced and tyrannical an interference with the rights of property to be tolerated. Those, therefore, who endeavor to enrich one part of society at the expense of another find it necessary to act with caution and reserve. Instead of changing the stipulation in contracts, they have resorted to the ingenious device of changing the standard by which these stipulations are adjusted. They have not said in so many words that 10 or 20 per cent. should be added to or deducted from the debts and obligations of society, but they have, nevertheless, effected this by making a proportional change in the value of money.

Let it be understood that this Government has never issued a bond or created a debt of any kind specifically payable in gold. The act of March 18, 1869, "to strengthen the public credit;" the refunding act of July 14, 1870; the coinage act of February 28, 1878; the Matthews Senate resolution; the terms of the bonds themselves, plainly printed on their face, all unmistakably declare the debt payable in coin. On what principle of ethics, then, does the bondholder ask to have silver demonetized, gold made dearer, and then that his debt shall be paid in the dearer metal? It can not be forgotten that this debt was created in the first instance in greenbacks; that it was afterward changed to a coin debt, doubling it in the hands of the holder. Now to ask that the standard of payment shall be changed to gold, and the value of the gold increased by demonetizing silver, is an insult to the moral sense of all honest people.

The bondholder is equitably and legally entitled to the thing he bargained for, to be paid at the time agreed upon, and no more. Whether silver has fallen or gold risen does not enter into the question here. The honest dollar is the dollar of the contract.

It is always the right of the debtor to elect which kind of money he will pay in. Without this right legal tender would be of no use.

Let us next consider the change in the value of gold as evidenced by a

FALL OF PRICES.

The London Economist admits a fall in prices in the last ten years of 33⅓ per cent. Mr. Giffen, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Grenfell, and others say from 30 to 35 per cent. to 1883. Mulhall, coming down to 1885, makes the price-level in the United States 46 per cent. lower than in 1872. While in Great Britain it is 43 per cent. lower, in France it is 34 per cent. and in Italy 37 per cent. lower. And all authorities agree that prices generally are now lower than before the gold discoveries in 1849.

A fall of 33⅓ per cent. in commodities is the same thing as a rise of 50 per cent. in the value of money. Hence the rise in the value of gold has already added at least 50 per cent. to the debt and tax burden which dead generations have imposed upon the world. Locke says:

> Money, while the same quantity of it is passing up and down the kingdom in trade, is really a standing measure of the falling and rising value of other things in reference to one another, and the alteration of price is truly in them only. But if you increase or lessen the quantity of money current in traffic in any place, then the alteration of value is in the money.

Exactly the case under consideration. The alteration is in the measure, and not in the goods.

I do not claim that the lower level of prices of all commodities is due exclusively to a change in the scale of valuation. Improved methods of production, lessening the cost of production and increasing the quantity of products, affect price-levels; but taking labor-energy as the test, and changes in price-levels from these causes in ten years are inconsiderable as compared to changes in price-levels due solely to a change in the measure, which amounts to at least 50 per cent. Fifty per cent. of $75,000,000,000 of debt is $37,500,000,000. Four per cent. interest on this gives $1,500,000,000 a year.

In thirty years the interest alone on the addition to the world's debt made by the alteration in the money scale which has already taken place, if allowed to stand, will amount to as much as eight generations of the English-speaking race have accumulated on this continent! In the same way the eight and a half billions of taxes levied annually by these countries for interest charges and maintaining governments became over twelve billions by altering the scale from gold and silver to gold alone. For no matter how much money may be increased in value, the same number of dollars are required for debt and taxes.

Cyrus, in his conquest of Asia, by despoiling the inhabitants of their wealth, took back to Persia, it is said, $10,000,000 in gold and $200,000,000 in silver. Alexander plundered cities and temples and obtained as the spoils of his conquests $225,000,000. Paulus Æmilius in turn plundered Macedonia and carried to Rome as public plunder $75,000,000 in gold and silver. Pompey gathered from the East $90,000,000 more. These conquests have stood as marvels of public robberies. But by the alteration that has been effected in the measure of value and the means of paying the world's vast debts the debt-holding classes are enabled through legislation to wrest from the laboring masses of mankind more millions in a single year than the plunder of all the great conquests of the world have ever amounted to.

Governments are thus made the instruments of spoliation, fraud, and iniquity.

One must be deprived of all power of moral perception, it seems to me, to justify such acts.

But take the United States alone. Population, 58,000,000; wealth, forty-five billions; revenues—State and national together—six hundred and ninety-five millions. What must be the necessary consequences of changing the scale from two metals to one? Instead of forty-five thousand millions of wealth by the bimetallic scale, it would stand at about twenty-five thousand millions measured by the gold standard alone. Taxes, State and national, and interest on public debts, now amount to 1½ per cent. of the total wealth and 8 per cent. of the gross products of all the people, taken at ten thousand millions. A change in the scale from gold and silver to gold alone would bring taxes relatively up to 2½ per cent. of the total wealth and 12 per cent. of the gross products, or from $695,000,000 to $1,050,000,000.

Revenues and taxes have increased in almost as great a ratio as debts, and must necessarily increase with increasing indebtedness. Statistics show that the cost of government in the United States has increased four times as fast as population.

But the end is not yet. With no gold production for money, and silver demonetization to go on, a further decline in prices, including all landed properties, must certainly follow. Yes, before the transition from bimetallism to gold monometallism is completed and the mass of debt-paying money is reduced from both metals and paper based on both to gold alone and paper based on gold only, a fall of 50 per cent. from the average prices that prevailed from 1850 to 1875 must be expected. A fall of 50 per cent. in prices means an increase of 100 per cent. in the value of money.

What railroad corporation or manufacturing establishment can endure such a scaling down of its property and earnings while its fixed charges remain the same? What proportion of debtors would have anything left?

It does not take a prophet to see, as John Bright sees, that European countries are fast drifting into catastrophies—catastrophies that the United States may not altogether escape either, if this policy be pursued to its final conclusion. And yet in all this the President seems to see but a purpose on the part of the debtor class to pay in a depreciated metal! In his message he says:

> The so-called debtor class * * * are not dishonest because they are in debt, and they should not be suspected of a desire to jeopardize the financial safety of the country in order that they may cancel their present debts by paying the same in the depreciated dollars.

This apology for the debtor class might be called for if that class were seeking to add to gold and silver another metal, in order that the whole mass might be diluted and the volume of money thereby increased, making money more plenty, so that the prices of labor and commodities would be made higher and debts thereby more easily discharged. But what shall be said of the creditor class, conspiring as it has throughout the civilized world to change the money standard by taking out of the money volume one of the metals that has been recognized from the earliest dawn of civilization as a money metal? Ah! it is the creditor, and not the debtor, that is asking to have the standard changed, the scale altered; it is the creditor that is asking for the dearer and larger measure, not the debtor for a smaller or cheaper.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his late report says: "Changing the measure changes nothing except the ownership of the property of the losing ones." I can but look upon this expression as an unfortunate one and regret that it was admitted into an official report. When one man robs another, possession, but not ownership, is changed. It requires the legalization of robbery to change ownership; but in ethics robbery is robbery, and lending the sanction of governments to it does not justify it. Indeed the perfection of the art of robbery by wholesale is to create vast debts by one scale and require payment by another. The ancient modes of conquest and plunder by tyrants, sea-kings, and pirates sink into insignificance when compared to this modern way of sequestrating to the few the wealth produced by the many.

The act demonetizing silver in this country in 1873 was a satanic device to work out this very end, and it is no wonder that no one has had the courage to come forward and claim its authorship. More injustice, fraud, and iniquity have grown out of this act than out of any act of confiscation or spoliation ever inflicted upon mankind.

But silver has fallen, it is claimed. Fallen as compared with gold for reasons I have given. Yes; but as compared with commodities, no. As compared with labor, no. An ounce of silver will buy more labor now than ten years or five years ago. It will take more labor, or more of the produce of labor, to discharge a mortgage now in silver bullion than to have discharged it in gold ten years ago. It will take more labor-energy to pay the remaining national debt in silver now than it would to have paid it all in gold fifteen years ago.

THE EFFECT ON INDUSTRIES.

But the effect of reducing the world's money to one metal is not only to increase debts; it at the same time breaks down industries and stops the accumulation of wealth. While the transition is going on prices necessarily fall to lower and lower levels. Production can not go on prosperously with falling prices. It is at this point that labor and the future welfare of the great mass of the people enter into the problem. "Not gold but industry causeth a country to flourish," says Bishop Berkeley. Whatever destroys the industries of a country checks the production of wealth and strikes at the very life of the people.

As industries are organized in modern civilization, labor and capital are so related that they must thrive together or not at all. Laborers can earn bread only when industries are in motion. Industries will continue active only so long as profits can be made. But with prices constantly going down profit on industrial capital is impossible. If what is produced one month is worth less the next, profits will disappear. I need not follow the various steps that must be passed through, the struggles, the strikes, and the lockouts that always attend manufacturing on falling markets. It is a road that necessarily leads to bankruptcy if followed long enough.

Contraction of a currency operates first on credit and by undermining and breaking down credit acts with compound force on production. A difference of a thousand millions' worth in the gross products in a country like ours may be easily made by a disturbance in the relations of money and credit to production. I believe it could be shown that the contraction in the money volume then taking place had the effect to reduce the gross products of this country by more than two thousand millions it 1877. How much the productions of the country have been lessened by the shrinkage of the money volume during the last three years can not be determined; but one thing is certain, and that is that a shrinking volume of money, crippled industries, idle labor, hard times, and general distress, inevitably go together.

These conditions stand related as cause and effect. There never has been a period of great distress growing out of diminished production and bad trade, that was not preceded by a contraction of money, nor a period of prosperity that was not supported by a sufficiency of money.

Alexander Baring, in his evidence before the parliamentary committee of 1819, said: "The consequences of a contraction or expansion of the amount of money in a country seem more felt during the progress of such contraction and expansion than from any positive amount of money at any one given period." In short, money is to capital employed in industries what industrial capital is to labor. It is the motive power behind both. Withdraw it, and capital is forced to suspend, machinery stops, and the hands of labor are tied. Then comes the struggle for life. Strikes, disorders, and social troubles follow.

It is—

in the shadow of a shrinking volume of money that disorders, social and political, gender and foster, that communism organizes, that riots threaten and destroy, that labor starves, that capitalists conspire and workmen combine, and that the revenues of government are dissipated in the employment of laborers or in the maintenance of increased standing armies to overawe them.

Is not this what the cable announces as taking place in the heart of populous London to-day? The shrinkage in the world's money is the primary cause of trade depression everywhere, and of the want which finds expression in these uprisings of the suffering people.

Is it not true, then, that the future welfare of the country and the world is profoundly involved in this great issue? The injustice may not be so manifest and glaring as in the case of debtors, but I believe the effect of making gold the only money will be to reduce in a generation more people to a condition no better than slavery than ever there were of black slaves in this country, or than ever there were slaves of any color anywhere at any one period of the world's history.

I have shown how capital stands related to labor. Limit the money volume to gold; make it so small that banks can control it, and power over all is concentrated in their hands. What must follow may be seen from an extract from a London bank circular put out as far back as 1862. I do not vouch for the authorship, but it is a scrap I have saved. Somebody wrote it, and it shows that somebody saw a long way into the future. What has not already been realized will be accomplished by the complete demonetization of silver. The circular contains the following:

Slavery is likely to be abolished by the war and be destroyed. This I and my European friends are in favor of, for slavery is but the owning of labor, and carries with it the care of the laborer, while the European plan led by England is capital controlling labor by controlling wages. This can be done by controlling the money. The great debt that capitalists will see to is made out of this war must be used as a measure to control the volume of money. To accomplish this they (the bonds) must be used as a banking basis. We are now waiting to get the Secretary of the Treasury to make this recommendation to Congress. It will not do to allow the greenback, as it is called, to circulate as money any length of time, for we can not control them. But we can control the bonds, and through them the bank issues.

No doubt that changing our standard to gold alone would bring us onto the European plan of finances.

But before this can be accomplished in this country the power of the people must be utterly destroyed. Republics can not stand on such a foundation, nor can thrones or empires very long, in these days.

I have stated some of the consequences which in the nature of things must follow the abandonment of silver. These conclusions, it is believed, are in accordance with monetary principles founded upon experience. Economic science, like every other science, rests upon certain general conceptions arrived at by the method of inductive logic applied, since the days of Bacon, to all scientific inquiry.

Conclusions to stand must conform to these general principles. The chief value of what is known as the historic method in political economy is to test the soundness of a priori conclusions. Let us apply this test to the conclusions I have drawn.

Take the monetary situation as it stood thirteen years ago. Until the change then inaugurated everybody had the right to have gold or silver converted into money without limit. For indefinite ages these metals had both been separated from everything else and set apart by the common consent of mankind and the decrees of nations as money metals. Their value depended upon the quantity in use on the one hand, including the annual yield of the mines and the demand for them for all uses on the other. Governments declared the ratio at which they should be coined and there left them. The production, trade, and commerce of the world were based upon and had become adjusted to the mass of the two metals.

The annual production of the mines answered the increasing needs of commerce, especially since the discovery of the American continent. This condition, I say, continued until thirteen years ago, when a disastrous monetary revolution was inaugurated. I can not go into the details of this movement here. I have time to deal only with consequences. What have the consequences been? Has the world gained by the change? Has any country gained by it? Has trade been more prosperous? Has wealth accumulated faster? Has the condition of the laboring classes been improved? On the contrary, has it not been a period marked by falling prices, impeded industries, growing distress among laboring classes in all countries, increased bankruptcies, and the reduction of vast numbers of people from small capitalists and independent property-holders to mere wage earners?

At the very beginning of this movement against silver, in 1873, a great statesman, Disraeli, with wonderful foresight predicted as necessary consequences the very things the world has since experienced. He said, "We must expect great disturbance in monetary affairs, decline in prices, falling off in trade, the ruin of manufactures, and distress among laboring classes."

Wolowski, Seyd, and a few other economists foresaw what must follow the war on silver, and results have shown with what marvelous precision they calculated the force of the revolution then just begun. But in order to bring out more clearly and to exhibit historically the effect of the partial transition from bimetallism to gold monometallism let us compare two periods that come within the observation of most of us.

Take the quarter of a century from 1850 to 1875, after the discovery of the gold fields of California and Australia. Leave out the effect of the temporary issue and withdrawal of paper money, which must be considered as a force acting as a disturbance to more permanent forces. During this period there was added to the world's supply of the precious metals about $3,500,000,000 of gold and $1,700,000,000 of silver, and of this sum of over $5,000,000,000, $3,000,000,000 went to swell the money volume. In 1852 the production of gold ran up to $180,000,000. The mints of Europe during this period coined annually an average of about $125,000,000.

The average annual production of gold alone, it will be seen, during the twenty-five years under consideration, was about $140,000,000, and silver about half as much, or about $210,000,000 of both, with the right, as I have said, to have it all converted into money at most of the great mints of the world. I have not time here to enter into details of the growth of production, trade, and commerce during this period. Suffice it to say that no other such period is to be found in the history of civilization. Now mark the change, beginning with 1875. Gold production has fallen off nearly one-half and silver coinage has been stopped, except the coinage of twenty-five millions worth of bullion a year in the United States. We have coined gold, but it has been largely gold from stocks from other countries.

Perhaps a clearer view of this monetary revolution can be had if we put the decade from 1863 to 1873 and that from 1873 to 1883 side by side. During the first decade there was added to the stock of metallic money in Europe, by the coinage of new metal from the mines, over $1,250,000,000, France alone coining $60,000,000 a year. That was a decade of great prosperity, as all will admit. In 1873 the monetary revolution—the movement to demonetize silver—began to take effect. See what has followed. Instead of a coinage of $125,000,000 of new money a year almost none has been coined, and the great mints of England, France, and Belgium are now practically idle.

On the other hand, Germany began to melt down silver coins and buy gold. The United States soon after began to accumulate gold for resumption; then Italy; so that of the stock of gold before existing in Europe, Germany took about $400,000,000, the United States $400,000,000, and Italy $200,000,000. These facts placed side by side show that in the one decade $1,250,000,000 was added to the European stocks of money; in the other little or none was added, but $400,000,000 was drawn to the United States and $600,000,000 spread out over countries theretofore using paper or silver. This was the "scramble for gold" we have heard about. It was the "too small blanket" Bismarck said the world was contending for, and yet they tell us that gold has not changed in value, but that silver has fallen, and that the remedy for the hard times is now to lay aside silver!

Comparing the business prosperity of these two decades, we find just the results that were predicted, just the condition of things that always has and always will attend on a shrinking volume of money. History, therefore, but confirms what monetary science teaches.

Turning to the future, what is before us?

First, this startling fact presents itself. The production of gold has fallen off, while consumption in the arts and dentistry has increased until the whole annual production of $93,000,000 is consumed for other purposes than money. More than this. Geologists agree that the future supply of gold is destined to diminish. All the great accessions of gold have come from placer mines, not from veins. Few countries remain which have not been well enough explored to render it certain that no more great placer mines will be found.

With no new gold for money and silver ruled out, where is our future money supply to come from? This is the question I address to the advocates of gold and to those who say stop the coinage of silver. The gold mines yield us now no money. Every ounce they yield is absorbed in the arts, for ornaments or use in dentistry. A little calculation shows that the annual production of gold is but about 7 cents for each of the world's population, or $2.25 to each inhabitant during the average lifetime of a generation. Nor is there any hope of improvement in the situation as to gold. Now shut off silver, and whence, I repeat, is the supply of metallic money to come? How is the stock in hand to be kept good even?

This is a question we must meet. I would like to have the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY], who has just spoken so eloquently for gold, meet it. It can not fail to impress profoundly every reflecting mind. It is the question above all others for the statesmen of this day. It affects not one country merely, but all countries; not one class merely, but all classes and all populations; not this generation alone, but future generations as well.

It would not be so serious a question if population was at a stand. But population in this country is increasing at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum. In a period but little longer than has elapsed since the close of the late war the population of the United States will have reached a hundred millions. Is there to be no more money for a hundred millions of people than for fifty-eight? If so, I ask again, what is it to be and whence is it to come? It must not be forgotten that the same amount of paper can not be kept at par with gold as with gold and silver together.

It may be answered that it is only proposed to stop coinage temporarily; that there is no intention of abandoning silver. This is nonsense. Stop the coinage of silver without providing for its use as money in some other way, and it is the last of bimetallism not only for this country but for the world. What tremendous consequences then hang on this issue! Once the "superior" metal is enthroned as the sole standard and it will never give place again to silver. The plea that by stopping coinage here other countries will be forced to agree with us on a common ratio is a delusion. Stop coinage now without some substitute and it is stopped forever. No, Mr. Chairman, the issue between bimetallism and gold monometallism is distinctly raised by the advocates of gold, and it must be fought out on that line here and now. A step backward is a surrender. Let that be understood.

I propose next to consider

THE OBJECTIONS TO SILVER.

It is claimed, first of all, that unless the coinage of silver is at once stopped gold will go to a premium and go out of circulation, and that the rest of the currency will thereupon fall to the level of the bullion value of silver. However impossible such a concurrence of events may be, no doubt such apprehensions are seriously entertained. I recall to your mind, Mr. Chairman, the fact that two years ago delegations representing boards of trade from different parts of the country came to Washington predicting the immediate expulsion of gold from the country, and endeavored to arouse Congress to a sense of the "great danger" that threatened us, and urged that safety lay only in the immediate suspension of silver coinage. These predictions have been repeated over and over again from that time to this. Are these fears and these predictions of disasters to come well founded? If so, good reasons ought to be given for them. On the other hand, if they are groundless, that ought to be shown. Let us, if possible, go to the bottom of this matter and see on what foundation these predictions rest.

1. Something more than one-third of our total money volume is gold. The last mint report gives the relative proportions of the currency in round numbers as $625,000,000 of gold, $300,000,000 of silver (including subsidiary coins), and $650,000,000 of paper. To what extent gold or other parts of the money volume are in actual circulation I will not stop to consider here.

2. It will be admitted that if gold goes to a premium it will go out of circulation. The result would be, of course, a sudden contraction of the total volume by more than one-third.

3. At the same time this contraction takes place it is claimed by those who make these predictions, the remaining currency—less than two-thirds of the whole—will immediately fall to the level of silver bullion, or 20 per cent. below the level of gold. That is, simultaneously with a contraction of the money volume by one-third there will be a depreciation of the remaining two-thirds by 20 per cent.!

When this proposition is clearly stated, I think it is fully enough argued. It is impossible that a dollar in a volume of money, after one-third of the whole has been taken away, population and wealth remaining the same, should have less value than a dollar of the whole volume. In other words, contraction and depreciation can not take place at the same time. These are conditions that can no more exist together than the bushel measure can be made larger and at the same time hold less. But inconsistent as is this proposition, it is nevertheless the one on which hang all predictions that gold will go to a premium and other money at the same time fall to the bullion value of silver.

Pressed to the wall on this theory, they tack about and say, "No, prices will not rise; they will fall, and silver and paper will appreciate, not depreciate." Putting these conditions together in logical order they would stand as follows:

1. Gold will go to a premium, resulting in a sharp contraction.

2. Prices will then fall; or, which is the same thing, money will rise—that is, will buy more.

So far cause and effect stand in logical relations. But if silver and paper, because of a contraction of volume, appreciate, how are they at the same time to fall 20 per cent. below gold? Like the first proposition, it is only necessary to state it clearly to refute it.

But let us go a step further. Our trade balances show conclusively that prices in this country are not now above the gold or international level of prices. If they fall, then they must go below the gold level; that is, silver and paper will rise above the gold level of values. Gold could not possibly stand at a premium under such conditions, nor does gold ever leave a country where prices are below the gold level. Gold goes to, not from, such countries.

I do not say there might not be a panic or a sudden scare that would cause gold to hide for a brief time, or that bankers might not combine to put gold temporarily to a premium; but I do say that the equilibrium would soon restore itself. To prevent this the world's money must be locked up and the world's commerce be stopped. No, gentlemen; better reasons must be given for these Cassandra prophecies, or they will not be believed. Some way must be found to get gold out of the country without involving violent contraction, a fall of prices, and the depreciation of the money left all at the same time.

HOW GOLD MAY BE EXPELLED.

Gold passes from country to country on the tide of high prices and in no other way.

When a currency other than gold becomes so redundant in any country as to carry prices above the international level adverse trade balances will follow, and gold or some equivalent must pass in settlement. Until securities came into use in settlement of such balances the precious metals only, and chiefly gold, were used. Undoubtedly if our volume of money should be so augmented as to fill the channels of trade to the overflow level independently of gold, gradually, as prices rose, gold would go out of the country. But if the outflow produced contraction, that itself would check the upward movement of prices, and this in turn would check the outflow of gold.

The rise and fall of prices, like a pendulum, controls the movement of gold. Nor can gold be kept at any considerable premium until it has been well-neigh all expelled from the country in the manner I have indicated. The question how large a currency would be required to expel all our gold, or how large an accession to our present currency would be necessary to start a movement in gold, may be answered in general terms as follows: Any country which sustains a volume of money other than gold equal to its distributive share of the world's money, or, which is the same thing, sufficient to maintain prices at the international or gold level of prices, will lose its gold, if it has any.

But if it has a less volume of other money than its distributive share of the world's money supply, as determined by international prices, then gold in sufficient amount to keep up the equilibrium will flow to, or stay in, such a country. That gold remains here is proof that our silver and paper do not alone constitute our share of the money of the world. How much must be added to make up our share independently of gold can not be forecalculated. The laws of trade, abundance here and scarcity abroad, are incalculable factors in determining beforehand the flow of gold. When, and under what conditions, then, will coined

GOLD AND SILVER PART COMPANY?

Gold and silver coins are of equal value now. The value of one thing is another for which it will exchange. Silver coins will exchange for as much of anything as gold coins. This is the crucial test of value, and there is no other. A silver dollar will buy as much of anything and everything as a gold dollar will. It will even buy of the miner the gold that will make a gold dollar; and having the same value everywhere in this country, it has the same value in every other country, less, possibly, the cost of sending it back here. All talk, therefore, of 80-cent dollars is sheer nonsense. These coins will "part company" only when silver, with the paper in use with it, has become so redundant as to fill the channels of trade to the overflow level, and on the tide of high prices send the gold, or the most of it, out of the country.

There must first be, I repeat, silver and paper enough to raise and sustain prices above the gold or international price-level before gold in any considerable amount will leave the country and before there can be a premium or more than a normal premium on gold. Gold can not now go to a premium and go out of circulation without producing violent contraction, which is equivalent to saying it can not go to a premium at all under existing circumstances, and nobody proposes such an inflation as will separate the coin of the two metals. But does not cheap money, my distinguished friend from Maryland asks, drive out dear money? Yes. But a dollar of cheap money can not expel a million dollars of dear money, nor one million a hundred millions, nor a hundred millions five hundred millions. Gresham's law is seldom correctly stated. Cheaper money will drive out dearer money, but only to the extent of its own volume. To drive out six hundred millions of gold, therefore, there must be six hundred millions of other money put in its place. One hundred millions can not, will not expel six hundred millions.

But, again, even if all our gold should be expelled, it does not follow that our money would then fall to the present level of silver bullion, or 20 per cent. below gold. It would only fall to that level when prices—not necessarily all prices, but prices of commodities that enter into international trade—had risen 25 per cent. above the gold level. For a fall of 20 per cent. in prices is equal to a rise of 25 per cent. in money. To sustain prices at such a level would require, as I have shown, a largely redundant currency. Meantime, while this was taking place, the gold would go to other countries, swelling the money volume and raising prices there. Just where gold premiums and price-levels would stand in such changes no one can tell. The elements in such a problem are too complicated and difficult to admit of definite calculation.

But let us take the exact problem that now presents itself in this country. The President in his message says:

> There is certainly not enough silver now in circulation to cause uneasiness; and the whole amount coined and now on hand might, after a time, be absorbed by the people without apprehension; but it is a ceaseless stream that threatens to overflow the land which causes fear and uncertainty.

It is admitted here that there is no danger from the silver coined up to this time. Very well. Our population has probably reached 58,000,000. Our money amounts to about $25 per capita. To maintain this proportion of money to population and wealth about $50,000,000 of additional money a year is required, and this increment should increase with the increment of increase in population.

But we are coining but about $28,000,000 of silver. There is then, at the end of each year, a deficiency rather than a redundancy. To bring this relation more clearly to view, suppose we go on coining $28,000,000 a year for ten years. We will then have added $280,000,000 to our money volume. But meantime population will have increased by at least 20,000,000, and wealth, in all probability, in a greater ratio. To maintain the same ratio to this new population of 20,000,000 that now exists without "causing uneasiness" at least $500,000,000 of additional money will be required.

If the present volume need cause no uneasiness, why then need the larger volume, with a larger population to use it, cause uneasiness? The truth is, if no more than $28,000,000 a year of silver is coined there will be an increasing scarcity and not a redundancy of money, which will be felt in falling prices, unless this condition is relieved by accessions of gold or other money. Because the coinage of silver since 1878 has not kept pace with needs for money gold has increased during this period by more than $400,000,000. In fact, during the past year we have gained $18,000,000 of gold by imports and as much, more the product of our own mines. So that we are now in fact farther from a separation of the two metals as money than when the act of 1878 was passed, or any time since.

But suppose the coinage of silver should be stopped. What then will be the situation ten or twenty years hence? Is there to be no more money for a hundred millions of people than for fifty-eight millions? It is plain that to shut off money supply from an increasing population is in effect the same as to contract the money volume with a stationary population. Think of contracting the money volume 3 per cent., or $45,000,000 a year, for ten years! What would be the condition of the country at the end of that time? But it would be no worse than to stop money supply with population increasing at the rate of 3 per cent. a year.

I think it is made clear enough, without pursuing this reasoning further, not only that the stream of increasing population will absorb, and more than absorb, the "ceaseless stream" of $28,000,000 of silver coins a year, but that to dry up this stream without providing some other supply would be a veritable cause of "uneasiness," and would be ruinous in its consequences.

It has been suggested that the volume of our circulating medium may be largely increased through instrumentality of national banks. For one I prefer the silver or silver citificates. But surely if silver will "drive out gold," national-bank notes will have the same effect. Indeed, if there were any real danger of driving out gold now, why would it not be better to contract bank notes than to stop silver? The withdrawal of $50,000,000 of bank notes would have the same effect as the melting down of $50,000,000 of silver coins. But I am not suggesting that there is any such necessity upon us. I think on the contrary that some provision is needed for supplying the place of bank notes as they are retired.

But suppose some gold should leave us. It is said that the gold is now largely hoarded. It would go then from the hoards and not from circulation. Fifty millions of gold transferred to the other side would swell the volume of money there and help the market for our cotton, meat, and breadstuffs. I do not hesitate therefore to say that it would be better to let some of our gold go where it will help markets for our products than to keep it locked up here; better active there than in hoards here. Our coins will not part company and stay parted if fifty or even a hundred millions of gold drawn from hoards should go abroad.

The objection that gold is paid out for silver for coining I confess I cannot understand. There is certainly no law requiring it, and no reason that I can understand exists why payments have been or should be made in that way. Silver dollars will buy just as much silver metal as gold dollars will.

Mr. BLAND. Does not Mr. Coe give the reason when he says it was to avoid the necessity of paying out silver certificates?

Mr. WARNER. That may be a reason, but it is not a good reason.

But the shallowest plea of all is that the laborer will suffer by being paid in depreciated dollars. The distinguished gentleman from Maryland who has preceded me has laid great stress on this plea.

In the first place silver dollars are not depreciated. They are equal in value, as I have shown, to gold, and we are trying to prevent the further appreciation of the gold dollar. The fact, however, is that the whole theory on which this plea is made is fallacious. Who is simple enough to suppose that a laborer can get for his labor the same number of dollars after they have been doubled in value as before? Can you increase wages by simply increasing the value of money? If that could be done, all that would be necessary to secure high wages would be to increase the weight of coins, or in any other way make money dearer. Again, a dollar becoming dearer means that more commodities or more of the products of labor, must be given for it. Commodities in the last analysis are but labor crystallized; hence, when more commodities must be given for a dollar more labor must be given. How can you have a dollar that will at the same time command less labor and more of the products of labor? No, gentlemen, when dollars become dearer and commodities cheaper, labor gets cheaper too. There is no escaping that, and the absurdity of the claim that dollars can be made dearer and labor still get as many of them is exposed when the case is fairly presented.

But the mischief to the laborer, of making money dearer, is that he gets nothing to do, and consequently gets no dollars at all. I have already shown that falling prices—which is only the opposite side of the balance to rising money—undermines all industries and leaves labor without employment; for when the manufacturer gets no profits, capital no interest, the laborer gets no wages. The essential thing for the laborer is employment, it is work whereby he can earn bread, and it matters little to him whether he gets his pay in half dollars or full dollars, if he only gets enough of them. The laborer understands all this, and can not be deceived by the sort of sophistry the gold advocates resort to. Indeed, the attempt to make believe that a gold standard is in the interest of the "poor laborer" is little short of ridiculous. It is but the devil masquerading in the guise of a saint.

But we are told that

SILVER WILL NOT CIRCULATE.

On the 31st day of December, 1885, there was in the Treasury altogether $507,661,446; 72,335,765 of this were in silver dollars, unrepresented by outstanding certificates. The excess of money in the Treasury over and above all demand liabilities of every kind, except greenbacks for redemption, was at the same time over $200,000,000. At the same time, too, there were $194,000,000 of interest-bearing debt subject to call. Every dollar of this two hundred millions, except the profits on the coinage of silver and income from the public lands, had been collected into the Treasury by taxes levied upon the people. There is no way in the world to get this money out but to pay it out in the expenses of the Government or on the public debt. There is no way by which the people can call this money out. It can not be got with corn nor cotton nor anything else, at any price.

And yet we are told that the silver will not leave the Treasury! Pay this surplus out on our overdue debt, and it will not come back to the Treasury except as it is taxed back. Whether the people desire to have the coin itself, or prefer certificates representing it, dollar for dollar, is of no consequence whatever. The one thing of importance is the maintenance of a stable money volume. Everything is embraced in this. If, therefore, the people prefer paper representatives, let them have it; if they prefer coin that "jingles," let them have that. In either case the money supply is kept up just the same, and that is all there is in this question.

Another objection to silver, ever ready to be offered, is, that this is the age of

and that real money is not needed as heretofore. But I deny that bank-checks are money, or that they are an addition to the money volume, or that they take the place of money. They undoubtedly facilitate the use of money and permit its accumulation in banks, where it becomes the basis of vast credit operations.

A hundred years ago merchants kept their money in their own tills, paying it out and taking it in over their counters, and the money then in trade was all actual money; and by money I mean that which has general acceptance in all payments; but now if ten merchants are doing business with a cash capital, say, of $10,000 each, the first thing they do is to deposit the cash in a bank. The bank thereby gets $100,000 cash deposits. The merchants, instead of paying money over their counters as formerly, give checks on the bank, which is simply an order to transfer cash from one to another; but the checks add nothing to the $100,000 deposited.

The addition to money or inflation is not in the checks. It is in the bank credits which arise out of this deposit. The bank finds that it can safely loan 60 per cent. of the $100,000 and still have enough left to answer all demands for currency. Accordingly it loans to others to trade on $60,000 of its $100,000 deposits, which in turn is in large part "deposited" in the same bank. Then the bank has $160,000 of deposits; $100,000 being money and $60,000 nothing but credit. Usually they proceed to loan 60 per cent of the $160,000, and thus credit is piled on credit for trading purposes. Here is where nearly all the inflation of modern times comes in, and this is what Mill characterized as robbery. Which is better, to extend this credit system or rely more on real money? Which is better, the system of France, where more money and less credit is used, or our system of more credit and less money?

Statistics are given to show what a small per cent. of payments in stock exchange and clearing-house operations is made in money; as if we had reached a period when money was no longer needed. If two men should wager a billion of dollars, first one losing and then the other the same amount, they might offset their claims and square accounts without the use of money. This would be a tremendous transaction without any money at all. But what effect would it have on the real operations of trade? Nine-tenths of the operations on the stock exchange of New York have not a whit more to do with the vast operations of producing and exchanging the ten thousand millions' worth of the products of the country—some of it many times over. It is the multitudinous transactions in the vast daily trade of the country, and the hundred millions earned weekly as wages that require money and can not be safely carried on with credit bubbles.

The mythical notion, therefore, that somehow, in some indefinable way, prices are determined not by money but by book entries, mere balancing of accounts, or one sort of sign or another, is moonshine and will not bear analytical examination. Money may be modified or diluted, so to speak, by credit; but after all credit, prices, and everything else rest on the money volume, and any alteration in that, other things remaining the same, not only affects credit itself, which, when it gives away, acts with compound force to bring down prices.

I know it is denied by the advocates of a gold standard that there is any such relation between money volume and prices as is here claimed. But if there be no such relation, why object to increasing the volume of money? If contraction will not lower prices, surely expansion will not raise them! But this class of economists is never slow to see that an increase of money will raise prices, but they would like to have us believe that contraction has no effect the other way.

Again, it is claimed that there is now more money in the country than will circulate—the banks have more than they can lend or know what to do with. My friend from Maryland did not fail to remind us of this.

But does not all the wealth of the country—railways, lands, houses, commodities, labor—stand always as offered against money? Why is not money offered more freely for property? Plainly because it is safer and more profitable at such times to hold money, which is appreciating, than other property, which is depreciating. Nobody wants to borrow money to invest on falling markets. There may be those who would borrow to pay debts, but banks do not seek this class of borrowers. In short, to invest money when prices are falling is to lose it; to keep it is to gain the increase it undergoes.

Suppose two men had $100,000 each three years ago and that one of them invested his in lands, houses, or in some industrial undertaking, while the other buried his in the earth; which would be the better off now? Doubtless the one who buried his money could buy the other out and have a large margin, above interest, left. As a matter of fact, for the last three years no one could afford to borrow money to invest and agree to pay back even the principal, saying nothing of interest. It is a law of money that with a contracting volume and falling prices it accumulates in hoards and lies idle. As in times of panic it is wise temporarily to expand the currency, so in time of great stagnation it may be wise also to provide some measure of expansion.

I agree that the

can not be accepted as permanent. I admit that the present situation is not satisfactory, is not logical or consistent with sound monetary principles. Nothing but the restoration of silver to its ancient place as a money metal equally with gold can permanently stand. Natural regulation by the mines on the one hand and by trade on the other must be restored. There is no advantage in metallic money over paper if it is to be regulated in the same way. Silver coins upheld by legislative limitations on quantity are but greenbacks made of white metal instead of paper. The greater value of the metal as a commodity in the one case does not change the principle.

Bimetallism is the unlimited use of the two metals as money.

The right must be restored for everybody to have the two metals converted into money without limit or hinderance. Nothing short of this is bimetallism. Nothing short of this will satisfy the demands of equity. Nothing short of this will afford money supply adequate to the endless demands of the gigantic operations of modern commerce. Nothing short of this will sustain the vast industrial operations of the modern world, in which labor has such a tremendous stake. I, therefore, put unlimited monetization and natural regulation before everything else. How shall this be accomplished? We have tried international conventions. The President advises us that there is no hope, at least for the present, of an agreement on a common ratio between the two metals.

Meantime evidence of a profound movement among the agricultural classes of Germany in favor of silver, "with or without England," comes to us. They see the mistake they made in 1871. England on the other hand adheres to her policy of gold monometallism, inaugurated by Lord Liverpool in 1816 when gold was the cheaper metal. England is a creditor nation, and the power that controls the government is the money power. Indian exchanges may be an inconvenience in government transactions with India, but on the other hand every fall in silver operates as a bounty on the wheat and cotton of India.

A thousand pounds sterling will exchange for not quite five thousand silver dollars in the United States; but with free coinage of silver in India it will now command silver that will make 13,050 rupees, which are equal to $6,329. Rupees have fallen very little in India relatively to commodities. They will buy as much wheat and cotton now as when silver stood at the ratio of 15½ to 1 in Europe; consequently the buyer of wheat or cotton in Liverpool finds that by converting his thousand pounds sterling first into silver bullion and then into rupees at Calcutta he gains $1,300, or 26 per cent. over exchanging it for silver coins in the United States, or which is the same thing to him, into American exchange. Every fall in silver, therefore, operates to lower the price of American wheat and cotton at Liverpool and correspondingly at New York and Chicago.

This explodes the notion that we should stop coinage here in order to compel England to unite with other countries on a common ratio. The proposition also that we must close our mints and await the action of other countries as the best way to establish bimetallism must go hereafter as a mere pretense of those who want no silver. We can not rest our money system on what foreign countries may do. We must act for ourselves. I do not propose to discuss here any particular plan for ourselves. I may do that another time, if there should be occasion for it. I shall favor any action that looks to the complete rehabilitation of silver. I am prepared to take a half-step if it be in this direction, but no step in the direction of gold monometallism.

I believe in the safety of well-settled principles in the science of money as in all other sciences; and such principles there are—principles which have stood the test of time; principles which have had the sanction of thinkers and writers in all ages, from Aristotle to Paulus, and which, surviving the night of the Middle Ages, reappear with Locke, Condillac, Ricardo, and Mill. By these principles I propose to stand.

> Tell me, therefore, for law sincere,
> If these meto-wands are even and sure,
> Fit for the rich and fit for the poor,
> Both to measure land and condition;
> Tell me as you would eschew perdition.

[Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MORRISON moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. BRADY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD the following amendment, which he gave notice he would propose at the proper time to the bill (H. R. 4833) relating to the taxation of fractional parts of a gallon of distilled spirits:

Add to section 1 the following proviso:

"Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to brandy and wine manufactured from fruit, nor shall any such tax upon the fractional part of a gallon be assessed against any distiller engaged in the manufacture of brandy and wine from fruit."

DUTIES ILLEGALLY EXACTED.

Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that it do pass:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House what sum of money appears to be claimed in the suits begun against collectors of customs for duties illegally exacted on imported merchandise that are now pending in the southern district of New York, together with the total number of those suits, and, so far as practicable, a classification thereof according to the issues of law or fact involved in each; also, that he be requested to inform this House what judicial arrangements have been or can now be made for the prompt trial of such suits as arose in said southern district of New York under tariff laws prior to that of 1883, and for a proper disposition, at the same time, of those suits that have arisen under the last-named law; and also that he inform this House what additional legislation, if any, is in his opinion needed to enable the Treasury Department to properly defend these suits, and to finally and promptly ascertain the obligation of the Government therein, and to transmit any and all official correspondence on the subject which is in his possession and is pertinent to this inquiry.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRISON (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRAGG: Petition of Stephen Pine, Beaver Dam, Wis., asking relief for destruction of property, &c., during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BURNES: Memorial of Hon. H. M. Garlicks, Dr. Joseph Malin, and others, for the protection and preservation of the fish in Big Stone and Traverse Lakes, in the State of Minnesota and Territory of Dakota—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. COMPTON: Petition of James Crutchett, for payment of property taken by the Government, from military necessity, and promised to be paid for—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ERMENTROUT: Memorial of the State Viticultural Association of California—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FORNEY: Petition of James M. Smith, of Cherokee County; of Hugh W. Carden, heir of C. C. Carden; of Mary Smith, heir of Milly Wells, deceased; of Stephen Hurley, jr., son of Stephen Hurley, deceased; of A. H. Starling; of Ebenezer Cunningham; of Nancy Starling; of John H. Vandiver, administrator of John D. Vandiver, deceased; and of Samuel Starling, one of the heirs of William Starling, deceased, of Cherokee County; of Sallie M. Elliott, daughter and heir of John R. Whitlock, deceased, of Calhoun County, Alabama; and of R. T. Coles, administrator, praying for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GOFF: Petition of Harriet Murphy, for dependent mother's pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HEWITT: Resolutions of the Maritime Exchange, in favor of an appropriation for removing shoal in Buttermilk Channel, harbor of New York—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, resolutions of the American Institute of New York, in favor of a bill for the relief of Joseph Francis, inventor of the life-saving apparatus—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HAYDEN: Petition of F. W. Nickerson & Co. and other merchants of Boston; and of Daniel W. Job and others, of Boston, in favor of a general reciprocity treaty with the Dominion of Canada—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HEPBURN: Petition of Martha J. A. Rumbaugh, for relief—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HERMAN: Petition of citizens of Oregon, for a constitutional amendment for election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HITT: Petition of Margaret T. Skiff and 31 others, citizens of Rockford, for the passage of Senator Blair's resolution for a sixteenth amendment forbidding disfranchisement on account of sex—to the same committee.

By Mr. F. A. JOHNSON: Papers relating to the claim of John A. Trook, administrator of the estate of William Hughes—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KING: Papers relating to the claim of Dr. Robert Carter—to the same committee.

By Mr. LINDSLEY: Petition of Henry B. Seely, to be restored to his former rank in the Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. LOVERING: Petition of P. J. Lawlor, for reimbursement for lost check issued by Treasury Department—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCOMAS: Petition asking the prohibition of the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, petition for national inquiry into the alcoholic liquor traffic by the Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petition of the Yearly Meeting of Friends for a constitutional amendment that will prohibit the manufacturing, importation, and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 10, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting correspondence as to the necessity of the appropriation asked for the construction of quarters for hospital stewards; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication, together with the accompanying documents, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed if there be no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations here now, but my recollection is that in the law regulating the Army, in reference to providing quarters, a hospital steward is not considered to be an officer of the Army, and therefore does not come under the regulations providing quarters for officers. Their quarters are usually with the hospitals, as their duties are there. So I think the communication ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs to see whether a law of that kind should be passed. It is too much the case that all provisions for the Army in the last few years have been made on appropriation acts without due consideration, and unless there is something in the law passed at the last Congress on that subject, and I do not remember it, I suggest that the communication should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for its examination and recommendation in reference to the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the reference will be made to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report of the National Academy of Sciences upon the advisability of building a new naval observatory and other subjects; which was read.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the communication and accompanying papers be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which has the matter of building a new naval observatory before it.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of Gem City Assembly No. 2287, Knights of Labor, of Dayton, Ohio, in relation to the hours of labor; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial and concurrent resolution in relation to internal-revenue tax on all and any substance in semblance of butter and cheese not made exclusively from milk or cream.

Whereas the dairy interests of this State and the United States having become a potent factor in the commercial prosperity of the people; and

Whereas certain parties are engaged in the manufacture of a semblance of butter and cheese, the ingredients of which are fat and other substances not obtained from milk or cream, and the same is being sold in all the principal cities of the United States to the detriment of the dairy interests of this and all the States comprising the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to present and advocate the passage of a law providing that all such manufactured articles not made from pan milk or cream shall pay an internal-revenue tax of such amount per pound as shall protect the dairy interests of the different States, and all packages containing such manufactured articles shall be stamped as provided by the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, duly signed and attested, be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress by the secretary of state for their information.

I, Frank D. Jackson, secretary of state of the State of Iowa, hereby certify the above to be a true copy of the original resolution as passed by the house and concurred in by the senate of the Twenty-First General Assembly of Iowa as the same appears on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State.

Done at the capitol at Des Moines this 5th day of February, A. D. 1886, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth and of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

[SEAL.] FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of Monmouth Assembly No. 2691, Knights of Labor of Illinois, praying for the passage of a law opening the Indian Territory to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLATT. I present a petition signed by Mrs. Emily P. Collins, Frances Ellen Burr, and Mary Hall, officers of the Hartford (Conn.) Equal Rights Club, and other citizens of Hartford, Conn., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for woman suffrage. I move that the petition lie on the table, the proper committee having reported on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of the Knights of Labor Local Assembly No. 2437, of Highland, Pa., praying for the organization of a Territorial government for the Indian Territory and for opening all of the public lands therein to homestead settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Augustus D. Taylor, of Conshohocken, Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, praying reimbursement of money paid by him as one of the sureties on the bond given by Job H. Smith, of Philadelphia, to the Government for the payment of internal-revenue tax which might be due on crude petroleum oil refined by him in said city; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES. I present a petition of Knights of Labor at Coldbrook, Mass.; also of Knights of Labor of West Newbury, Mass., and of Knights of Labor of Mystic, Mass., all praying for the organization of a Territorial government in the Indian Territory, the immediate settlement of the public lands therein under the homestead law, and the opening of the Indian reservations for that purpose. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present a petition from the Knights of Labor in Westfield, Mass., in the same form with these, addressed to a Senator personally, but of a different character. Their attention has been called to the great wrong which exists in present legislation in the reduction of the wages of the printers in the Printing Bureau here in Washington, and in the name of the laboring men and women of Westfield, Mass., they implore the support of their Senators and Representatives of a bill, which is copied in the petition, for the purpose of restoring the wages of the printers in the Printing Bureau to what they were previous to the present enactment. I do not know exactly to what committee the petition ought to be referred, but it is of much importance.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the petition refers to the pay of printers in the Public Printing Office or in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. DAWES. It is set forth here to be in the Printing Office.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it should be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAWES. It should go, I suppose, to the Committee on Printing. If that meets the view of the chairman of that committee I ask that it be so referred, and I invoke the attention of the committee to the early consideration of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEWELL presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of grocers and importers of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and doing business in Philadelphia, favoring an increase of the appropriation for the Signal Service; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by a convention of colored citizens held in the city of Washington, favoring a grant of public land for educational purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of vessel-owners, captains, pilots, and shippers engaged in navigating what is known as Staten Island Sound, remonstrating against the construction of a bridge of such character as will interfere with the navigation of that water; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of the Local Assembly of Knights of Labor No. 2393, of Texas, praying for the organization of a Territorial government in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Beaumont, Jefferson County, Texas, praying that an appropriation be made for the continuance of the work upon the jetties at Sabine Pass; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COKE. I present a memorial of the Cotton Exchange of Houston, Tex., on the subject of interstate bills of lading, declaring that an act of Congress defining the rights of the railroad and other corporations, or persons engaged as common carriers, and of holders of bills of lading in good faith, is necessary for the protection of merchants and bankers, and in fact of all who are interested in maintaining the reliability and vast usefulness of these instruments of commerce, and praying for such legislation. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of the National Cotton Exchange, praying that liberal appropriations be made for the Signal Service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRISON presented the petition of the Clay City Local Assembly No. 1634, Knights of Labor, of Indiana, praying the organization of a Territorial form of government over the Indian Territory and the opening of the unoccupied land therein to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented a petition of citizens of Wicomico County, Maryland, praying for the repeal of the compulsory silver coinage law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, presented the petition of the Ocean Canning Company and other canners and exporters of Astoria, Oreg., praying the return in full of duties paid on imported material when manufactured and exported; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of James Hynes, late a private in Company I, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, praying for the removal of the charge of desertion from his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 165) for the relief of William H. Gray, of Kentucky, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1298) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to fit out an expedition to observe the total eclipse of the sun which occurs on the 29th of August, 1886, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1219) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1149) allowing discharged officers of the Army one year's pay and allowances, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of the Committee on Claims, I report favorably the bill (H. R. 3829) for the relief of Frances E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, deceased. A few days since I reported from the same committee a Senate bill precisely similar, and when that is reached on the Calendar I shall ask to substitute the House bill for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John S. E. J. Crawford, praying to have his claim referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 41) for the relief of James S. Clark & Co. reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 249) for the payment of Sewell Coulson and Porter, Harrison & Fishback for legal services, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 794) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT OF DISTRICT HEALTH OFFICER.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; 100 for the use of the Senate, 350 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,050 for the use of the health officer of the District of Columbia.

SMITHSONIAN AND NATIONAL MUSEUM REPORTS.

Mr. HAWLEY. From the Committee on Printing I report the joint resolution (S. R. 33) to provide for printing the annual reports of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum with a substitute in the form of a concurrent resolution, and upon that being read I shall move the indefinite postponement of the original joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Printing reports a concurrent resolution in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution to provide for printing the last annual reports of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the last annual reports of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum, in two octavo volumes, 16,000 extra copies of each; of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to put on record a very brief statement. We changed the resolution in another respect. It was a joint resolution and we made it a concurrent resolution, but the original resolution provided that there shall hereafter be printed these reports annually. The committee thinks it better to adhere to the old usage and bring all these matters under an annual revision, and we changed it so as to provide for printing only the reports now presented.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate joint resolution No. 33 will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

REPORTS ON ALASKA.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report on Alaska, by L. M. Turner, be printed with the necessary illustrations, and that 4,000 additional copies be printed; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for distribution under the direction of the Chief Signal Officer of the United States Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects to the present consideration of the resolution, and it goes over under the rules.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator let me state the reasons that led the committee to make a favorable report and then interpose his objection?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. The reports which the committee has recommended to be printed were made by two officers of the Signal Bureau who were sent to Alaska upon that service but for certain scientific purposes were placed under the orders and instructions of Professor Baird. The first prejudice of the committee was against printing such things, for it has happened before that when gentlemen, perhaps well qualified, were stationed in similar places they busied themselves at odd hours with scientific studies and made reports which they considered very valuable and interesting, as perhaps they were, and then were very ambitious to have the Government print them. We were inclined at first to put these reports into that general class; but I send to the desk to have read a letter of Professor Baird concerning them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 15, in reference to the reports upon the natural history and ethnology of Northwestern Alaska, made by Messrs. E. W. Nelson and L. M. Turner, meteorological observers in that country of the Signal Service. By the courtesy of the Signal Office the natural history labors of these gentlemen were prosecuted under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, which furnished instructions and the necessary material for the same, while the reports of these gentlemen were prepared at the Smithsonian Institution with the assistance of the collaborators of the National Museum.

I am, therefore, quite ready to say that the results obtained are of exceptional interest and value, as furnishing the only accurate and reliable information at our command upon the vegetable, animal, and mineral resources of the region, the productiveness and character of the soil, and other points of great practical interest in connection with the future of that country. Detailed notes of observations of their habits and life characteristics were secured by these gentlemen, with collections of specimens in such great magnitude and variety as to have made the National Museum pre-eminent by their possession.

The publication of these reports is therefore extremely desirable, as representing the only detailed and extended information at our command of a large region belonging to the United States.

Very respectfully,

SPENCER F. BAIRD.

General W. B. HAZEN,
Chief Signal Officer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PLUMB. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the report goes over, and the resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1445) for the relief of William T. Crump; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1446) granting a pension to Anna Nation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1447) to refund certain fees improperly paid into the Treasury; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1448) to empower the district and circuit courts of the eastern district of Pennsylvania to hear and determine the claims of William Brindle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1449) for the relief of John W. Johnston; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1450) to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Winfield and Fort Smith Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1451) to provide for holding terms of United States district and circuit courts in the district of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1452) to fix the number of hours to constitute a legal day's work for the employés of street car and other corporations organized by Congress in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1453) for the relief of Benjamin F. Fox; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1454) to provide for the enforcement of public and private justice and for the relief of Congress and the Departments from the adjudication of disputed claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1455) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1456) for the relief of William Gallick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1457) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Marquette, Mich.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1458) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan at Bay City, in said district; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1276) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender quality," passed February 28, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CULLOM, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Benjamin F. Fox, now on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

MONEY FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] which was laid over under the rules. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be requested to report to the Senate the aggregate amount of money proposed to be appropriated by the bills reported from that committee up to and including this day; also the number of buildings and the cost of each, and the State in which they are to be located; also the population of the cities or towns in which such buildings are to be erected, and the purpose for which each building is to used.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I proposed this morning to move myself to lay the resolution on the table, if we had before us any statement in the RECORD or otherwise of the appropriations proposed for this purpose and the other information required by the resolution; but upon examination of the RECORD I find that I can not get it there, and I see no document before us containing any of this information. I must insist, therefore, that the resolution, calling simply as it does for information, shall be passed by the Senate.

I should like to be further understood as not antagonizing any single proposition in these bills, any single appropriation in any of them, but as antagonizing the method adopted here yesterday of passing an omnibus bill to construct public buildings in a majority of the States of the Union. That is the reason of my inquiry. I think that if we are asked to make appropriations in the way in which we endeavored to make them yesterday it ought to be known in some condensed form in the RECORD what amount is to be expended, and the report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds responsive to this resolution will exactly accomplish that purpose. That is the object of my resolution and the sole object of it. I offer it not because I am opposed to the building of a courthouse at any place where there ought to be one; but for the committee to come in here with twenty-nine appropriation bills and ask unanimous consent to take them all up, and then that nine additional bills which were only reported in the morning and put upon the Calendar in the morning be also taken up, making thirty-eight, and each one passed through here. I think it is due to those of us who do not believe in that method of spending money to have a concentrated report from the committee placed upon the record showing where the money goes and whether there is any necessity for it. In regard to other matters, we know that as a rule a report from a committee involving an appropriation is expected to be made in writing. In these cases not only is there no statement in writing, but no report is made at all. I undertake to say that it is unprecedented for the Senate of the United States to take up nine appropriation bills and pass them here by unanimous consent on the same day that they are reported and put upon the Calendar.

That is why I ask for the passage of the resolution, and I see no reason why the resolution should not pass so that the information called for may come to us.

Mr. MORRILL. There is not the slightest objection to the passage of the resolution, and the information I dare say will be promptly communicated by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I hope the resolution will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order under the eighth rule.

Mr. PIKE. I move that House bill 989, Order of Business No. 156 on the Calendar, be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves to proceed to the consideration of House bill 989.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

MEMORIAL TO GENERAL HANCOCK.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside informally that I may introduce a resolution for present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent of the Senate to lay aside informally the present bill with a view to allowing him to submit a resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. I move the present adoption of the resolution which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library consider and report at an early day the expediency of erecting at the seat of Government a statue or monument to the memory of the late illustrious soldier General Winfield Scott Hancock.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, when the news was announced to the Senate yesterday of the great public calamity, the decease of this illustrious citizen, the Senate very properly followed all the precedents in like cases, and what I am sure would have been in accordance with the desire of that distinguished and faithful citizen of the United States, and proceeded with the public business. But I think it is proper that proceedings should be initiated at once for paying the tribute to the memory of this distinguished citizen contemplated in the resolution. I ask the immediate adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FOURTH OF JULY CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the pending bill will be resumed.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SILVER DEPOSITS AT SUBTREASURIES.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to call up the resolution submitted by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] and partially discussed a few days since.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], instructing the Committee on Finance to inquire into certain transactions of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans relating to the deposit of standard dollars, &c.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. EUSTIS on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire: First. Whether it has been the custom for the assistant treasurer at New Orleans to receive deposits of standard silver dollars from shippers of said coin and to issue to their correspondents at New Orleans receipts subject to count, and to issue silver certificates after the count of said dollars so deposited has been made; and whether said custom, if it has prevailed, has been changed by the instructions of the Treasurer of the United States and the reasons therefor; also, whether the said custom is now in force as regards any subtreasury of the United States. Second. Whether there has been, and is now, an adequate clerical force at the subtreasury at New Orleans to perform the duties of that office, so that holders desiring to deposit standard silver dollars, under the authority of law, may deposit them and receive therefor certificates without delay, and if such clerical force is insufficient, to report to the Senate what increase of said force should be made to secure a prompt execution of the law. That said committee are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I thought it was not proper that this resolution should pass silently from the consideration of the Senate after it had been partially discussed and had been made the foundation of some animadversions upon the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer of the United States. I do not like to sit in my seat as one member of the Senate and silently submit to what I conceive to be an injustice toward any official or any member of any public body connected with the Government.

The resolution introduced by the Senator from Louisiana is entirely respectful in its terms and asks for nothing more than an inquiry, but it is founded upon a correspondence already had with the Department, which contains letters that have been made the foundation of charges against these officers. In my judgment the correspondence of the Treasurer of the United States submitted by the Secretary, and the letters contained therein, are a complete and thorough vindication of that officer against any possible imputation that can arise from the facts. Although I can not object to the passage of the resolution, I wish to be understood as declaring that there is nothing in this correspondence which imputes the slightest blame or is in any manner properly a subject of inquiry by this body, because an inquiry implies more or less doubt.

Now, what is there in this correspondence? It is charged that the Treasurer of the United States has been unfriendly to the execution of the law for the exchange of silver certificates for silver dollars; and the fact upon which that allegation is founded, which has been made the occasion of a serious assault both upon the Secretary and upon the Treasurer, is a fact that there were two deliveries of silver tendered to the subtreasury in New Orleans which were not received because, as the Treasurer says, they were delivered without any demand for certificates, but for deposit in the subtreasury as an intermediary.

It would seem as if there was a very small difference between the delivery of a package of silver dollars by an express company to be accounted for in silver certificates afterward to some other person, and the delivery with a demand simultaneously for the certificates to be given in exchange for the deposit; but it will be seen by this correspondence that there is a difference, and a practical difference, and a difference which may lead, as it has, as I am informed, led to a serious loss in that very Department of the Government in the subtreasury at New Orleans between the receipt for the money not counted and the delivery of the certificates for the money deposited.

The Treasurer of the United States states in this correspondence that no instructions have been given the assistant treasurer which could be construed as interfering with the proper execution of the law requiring the issue of silver certificates to parties depositing silver dollars. That is either true or it is not true. The Treasurer proceeds to prove that, and it is unquestionably proved by this correspondence. He goes on to say:

When it became apparent, from the report of the committee sent last May to count the funds and examine the books of the subtreasury in New Orleans—

It appears, then, that there has been a committeee of investigation of the office of the asssistant treasurer and a report of a committee which has been the foundation of the action taken by the Treasurer. What has been the report of that committee? The report of that committee was that when they examined the books of the subtreasury in New Orleans the assistant treasurer was directed by the Treasurer—to secure strict accountability of officers and employés charged with the handling of moneys, instructions were issued to forward, as rapidly as possible, to this office, without assortment, all legal-tender and national-bank notes, and to accept for exchange into certificates no more silver dollars in any one day than could be counted and verified on the same day.

The Treasurer then had the report of a committee as the foundation for an order directing the subtreasurer at New Orleans to receive on any day no more silver money than could be counted and certified in one day. Is there any objection to that? Is not that a matter of sound business regulation and sound discretion on the part of the Treasurer? Is it so unreasonable that he should be arraigned and censured for it? What could they do with money which could not be counted and certified in the same day? Will any one reasonably contend that it should be deposited subject to count, with the possibility, as has occurred, as I am informed, that between the count and the deposit there might be a loss by robbery or fraud? There was a wrongful conversion by which $15,000 of the public money was lost. I am so informed by the Treasurer himself. But suppose it had not been so; is not the Treasurer to be allowed a sound discretion in saying, "I will not allow more money to be deposited in a single day than can be examined, counted, and the certificates issued for it," that it is to be made the subject of inquiry and a grave cause of imputation that this officer is interfering to obstruct the conversion of silver coin into silver certificates?

Mr. President, there is no foundation in this allegation for a charge of this kind. It is manifestly within the sound discretion of the Treasurer to issue such directions as in his judgment and as in fact may be reasonably adapted to securing a proper and strict accountability of the officers with whom this money shall be deposited. There is therefore nothing in this allegation, and the direction which was given was neither more nor less than that they should receive no more silver money than they could count and issue certificates for in any one day, with the qualification that these deposits so refused should be given the preference on the following day. It seems that under this state of things there were forwarded by express from the interior of the country packages of silver in two instances to be deposited and receipted for without being counted, subject to be accounted for to some bank in the city of New Orleans. The difference in this case was simply this, that under this instruction of the Treasurer no more money should be received in a single day than could be counted and the certificates issued for; and the practice of delivering by express without constituting the express agent the authority to receive the certificates, without reference to the capacity to count and certify in a day, might have involved the subtreasurer in a violation of the order which he had received, which, as we have seen, was manifestly a proper one.

The question then presented and the only one is, whether there is any obligation or duty under the law to receive all deliveries by express and receipt for them subject to the count to be afterward made and to account for them in silver certificates to a correspondent or agent? There is no such obligation or duty imposed by the law, as its language plainly indicates. Again, the law is to have a reasonable construction; it does not require the officers to receive at any one time more money than they can count, certify, and safely store. Reasonable time for the performance of the duty imposed is intended in every law. The law requires "neither vain nor impossible things." If it shall be contended that the public convenience and the interests of commerce require that proper facilities should be furnished at New Orleans to receive all money offered for exchange in silver certificates, that will not be denied; but that is not the ground of the censure that has been cast on these officers. And if it had been it may be replied that time and opportunity must be allowed them to supply the necessary facilities.

Now, I appreciate the difficulty which Senators, who have brought forward and advocated this resolution, find in this case, that there is a large accumulation of silver coin in the interior of the country and that the availability of that coin depends upon its ready convertibility into silver certificates; but that can not be done without adequate arrangements at the office at which this money is to be deposited, and there is no obstruction to that in an order that only so much as can be accounted for and certified in a day shall be received in one day. The proper course of these Senators, instead of reflecting upon the Secretary and the Treasurer for performing their duty with the means allowed to them, is to introduce a resolution providing for such additional force and such additional accommodations at that point as may be necessary to accomplish the purpose, so that the money may be received, deposited, and converted into certificates upon the same day in whatever quantities it may be offered.

Then the whole of this alleged charge upon the Treasurer and this censure which has been passed upon him by some members of the Senate is in the simple difference between depositing this money and giving a receipt for it subject to count and its being deposited, counted, and certified in the same day or simultaneously. I scarcely think it is a proposition which can be sustained that the Senate of the United States shall decide that the officer of the Government charged with this responsibility shall be required to receive indefinite and unascertained amounts of coin without its being counted and without its being certified, and subject either the Government or the officer so receiving it to the responsibility of a suit or a dispute or a controversy as to what was the amount of the deposit and to its safekeeping until a certificate had been issued. It is a very small foundation for so grave an accusation.

We find furthermore, sir, in this correspondence that immediately the assistant treasurer at New Orleans communicated by his letter of the 2d January, 1886, to the Treasurer of the United States this fact and asked instructions in regard to it. This instruction in the letter of January 7 was in these words:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, January 7, 1886.

SIR: Referring to yours of the 2d instant in regard to shipments of standard silver dollars from your correspondents to the subtreasury in your city, to be paid for to your bank, after count, I beg to inform you that the action of the assistant treasurer declining to receive such deposits is approved by this office.

Very respectfully,

J. W. WHELPLEY,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

T. R. ROACH,
Cashier State National Bank, New Orleans, La.

It seems then that, whether well or ill taken, the point raised in this correspondence, and now insisted on in the Senate, was whether the assistant treasurer at New Orleans should receive these deposits without reference to their being converted into silver certificates without a demand that they should be, and received subject to count to be accounted for afterward, as might be directed. The argument made with much earnestness and some acrimony is, that to refuse to receive and receipt for money subject to count, however much it may be beyond the facilities for storage and safe-keeping and counting and certifying is a conclusive proof of a purpose on the part of the Secretary and the Treasurer to violate the law for the purpose of discrediting silver coin.

There is no statute of the United States which requires that this money shall be received subject to count, allowed to remain there a longer or a shorter time, any longer time than is necessary to perform the act of counting and delivering the certificate. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] showed in his remarks the other day that it is a very short period of time that is required for it to be counted and certified and certificates delivered to the person authorized to receive them, but the time must of course depend on the amount. But in this case there was no transaction of this kind demanded. A deposit and receipt were asked for. For the general convenience of business it might perhaps very well have been so. It had become the custom to deliver to the express companies by the banks in the interior packages of silver to be shipped to New Orleans and converted into certificates; but manifestly it was the duty of the person so forwarding this money to have constituted the express company his agent and to have demanded that this money should be immediately counted and converted into certificates, and if the convenience of the Government and the reasonable convenience of the officers there and the facilities afforded to them were not sufficient to do it in one day, with whom should the responsibility of the custody of this money rest except with the parties who owned it until the facilities afforded would enable that duty to be discharged?

I am informed and I desire to state in vindication of the Treasurer of the United States that this very money thus deposited and thus accepted and receipted for subject to count by his predecessor caused a loss to the Government in the accounting that was subsequently had of $15,000. Between the time of the deposit and the time of the issue of silver certificates there was found to be a deficiency, and hence the Treasurer of the United States, in his communication referred to here, of the 1st of June, 1885, used this language. This letter is addressed to P. F. Herwig, assistant treasurer:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, June 1, 1885.

SIR: The report of the committee sent to examine your accounts as assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans, La., has been made to the Department, and I regret that they have been compelled to find fault with its management while under your care, though excusing in part its defects, for the following reasons: that the clerical force is small, the cashier in poor health, and the receipts of standard silver dollars and mutilated notes for redemption are often too large to be disposed of on the day of receipt.

These facts should have been communicated to this office, and not have been permitted to exist without some effort on your part to obtain relief.

You would have been justified in declining to accept deposits beyond the capacity of your office to handle, and when the complaints which would have resulted from pursuing this course had been brought to the attention of this office some other remedy would have been found than imposing burdens upon the clerks in your employment to such an extent that they have not been able to attend to their ordinary duties or keep the cash and other accounts in that order in which every well-regulated office of the Government should be kept, and such as an officer zealous in the discharge of his duties should make it his constant endeavor to secure.

You have been instructed by telegraph to return the mutilated notes now in your charge to this office without assortment, and may hereafter continue this practice until further instructions, taking care to notify the parties from whom you receive such notes that they are taken subject to such count and correction. It would be well to preserve the original straps and envelopes and forward the packages in their condition when received, though you may, if you have the time, count and verify the amount, merely, in order to expedite payment for such deposit without assorting the same.

If this method does not afford the desired relief, inform this Department as soon as possible what steps are practicable in this direction. I advise, further, that you accept no deposit of silver dollars beyond your capacity to handle in any one day, and that you give notice to the banks to that effect. Deposits so refused may be given preference on the following day.

Here is a prudent business regulation to require strict accountability in the deposits received. They are therefore required, as there had been a loss, that when a deposit is received the transaction shall be completed and that no longer than one day shall intervene between the deposit, the count, and the certification. I can not conceive that this is a subject of suspicion or inquiry. I can not conceive that properly it can be made a ground of censure, either implied or direct, on the part of this officer, or that it may be made the foundation of a grave accusation that here is an attempt to obstruct the execution of a law which requires that silver dollars in amounts not less than $10 may be at any time and shall be at any time exchanged for a silver certificate issued by the Government. It is simply a business regulation requiring prompt responsibility and very prompt means of ascertaining within a proper period of time what amount of money has been deposited.

We find, however, that at the conclusion of this whole correspondence which has been talked of here for the greater part of a day, in answer to the letter of Mr. Roach of the 11th of January, 1886, the Treasurer of the United States replied on the 14th day of January as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, January 14, 1886.

SIR: Referring to your inquiry of the 11th instant, I beg to say that in exchange for standard silver dollars deposited by your bank with the assistant treasurer in your city silver certificates will be furnished you, after count and certification by that officer.

Very respectfully,

J. W. WHELPLEY,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

The CASHIER,
State National Bank, New Orleans, La.

Mr. President, I only desired to say this much, for I thought it ought to be said by some person who is a friend of justice and desires to see that a public officer of the United States who discharges his duty conscientiously should not be censured improperly, that these facts are indisputable. They appear in this correspondence, and they furnish no ground of censure, no possible ground of suspicion. They vindicate this officer as a careful business man performing the duties intrusted to him with fidelity and in such a manner as to save the country and the people from a responsibility which may be avoided by good and safe business methods.

But it has been said in the course of this discussion that the Secretary of the Treasury and even the President of the United States were subject to suspicion, and that they, the Secretary particularly, had not given to this subject the same investigation and thought that other persons had. It was an assumption that unless a man had served in Congress he was not supposed to be familiar with the great financial questions of the day. I think the Secretary of the Treasury is a representative of that large class of people many of whom are fully equal to any member of Congress in either House, many of whom are men of the highest order of practical ability, who are profoundly versed not only in the theories but in the facts and truths relating to business, to currency, and to finance. And whatever may be our opinions—and I do not know that I should agree, probably I should disagree very widely with some of the opinions of this high and capable officer of the Government—it is unfair to assume that those who entertain the opinions that he has expressed are not men of ability and profound thought and practical knowledge.

It is not wise for us to assume that the wisdom of this country is confined to the Senate and to the House of Representatives. The opinions of the Secretary as to the currency, as to the proper methods of establishing a sound financial condition, and the opinions of the President have the support of many of the ablest men throughout the world; and however we may differ with them, it is not the part of wisdom or of reason to condemn them because they entertain opinions which may differ from others upon a question which involves the most profound thought and the greatest practical wisdom, and upon which the world has not yet attained a common platform of solution or ground of agreement.

The President and the Secretary and the Treasurer are all men of ability, thoughtful and conscientious, and desire to serve the country and promote the general welfare of the people. Their reports to Congress clearly evidence this, and the people of the country, in my opinion, have this confidence in them. They have a right to their own judgment and opinions on this and on all other subjects and it is their duty to lay them before Congress. It is not the part of reason and sound argument to be intolerant of others and to censure them because they do not agree with one's opinions.

It may be, sir, that some of us may be wrong; but at all events, in confining himself to his constitutional duty of submitting his opinions and recommendations to Congress, there is no reason for the censures cast on the President and Secretary, and it can not be denied that their opinions have been and are entertained by many of the ablest men throughout the world, and that it is believed by a great body of intelligent opinion that they have the sanction of experience, in part at least, to sustain them. I am not disposed to agree to and accept all their conclusions, but I am disposed to vindicate those who in the search for truth shall arrive at different conclusions from myself or from others from animadversion upon either their learning, their honest purpose, their patriotism, or their practical knowledge and wisdom. There is nothing in this correspondence to justify the adverse criticisms that have been cast upon the Secretary of the Treasury or upon the Treasurer. There is nothing in it that any intelligent or practical business man ought not to have done and would not have done under the circumstances. If Senators want greater facilities for the storage of silver and its exchange for silver certificates let them ask for them, and not to attack the President and Secretary for performing their plain duty.

Mr. PLUMB. The debate on this resolution has taken a pretty wide scope. I had no expectation of saying anything about it; but when the Senator from Louisiana who introduced the resolution said that he had done so for the purpose of ascertaining the object and motive of the Treasury Department in its action at the subtreasury at New Orleans, I was reminded of a conversation which I had with a former member of this body about a month since, who said to me that he had, in a conversation with the Treasurer of the United States, Mr. Jordan, complained to Mr. Jordan that the Treasury did not pay for silver bullion with silver dollars. He said Mr. Jordan replied to that that the reason he did not do that was because the persons who received the silver dollars would bring them back as soon as they got them and demand silver certificates for them, and he did not wish to encourage a practice of that kind.

I made that statement to a member of this body this morning, and he stated to me that Mr. Jordan had made the same statement to him, that he did not pay out silver dollars in quantities and in places where they would have any opportunity of being brought back to the Treasury and deposited under the law authorizing the persons depositing them to receive silver certificates, because he did not mean that the silver certificates should get out, for certain reasons which he went on to name.

I think this demonstrates that for some reason, which I must suppose, of course, to be a good one in the view of the Treasury Department, a settled purpose exists to prevent the issue of silver certificates in exchange for silver dollars. That is the more significant to my mind because it has been accompanied by what is an apparent determination to issue the silver dollars themselves. There has been a great show of issuing the silver dollars with a view, as has been said with a good deal of emphasis, of seeing whether the people wanted them, how many they could absorb, &c., while at the same time the representative of the silver dollar, the silver certificate, which is a convenience in business, which is never refused anywhere except at the clearing-house in New York, is not to be issued at all.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] asks me who Mr. Jordan is. He was by the grace of the President of the United States a few days ago, and I think still is, the Treasurer of the United States.

As I said, I think this throws a good deal of light upon the performances of the last summer, in which, while apparently consumed with a laudable desire to put out the silver dollar, there has been at the same time an intrigue going on with certain New York bankers, whereby the whole policy of the law with reference to silver was to be defeated and the object of the law was to be brought into contempt. We are not to have Congressional law, but Treasury law, or rather the laws which Congress has made are to be violated and trampled under foot because a subordinate in the Executive Department, a creature of law, is not suited with the statutes.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I will read the third section of the act of 1878, "to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar, and to restore its legal-tender character." It is as follows:

SEC. 3. That any holder of the coin authorized by this act may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than $10, and receive therefor certificates of not less than $10 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. Said certificates shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and, when so received, may be reissued.

That is a part of an act which was returned by the President of the United States with his veto, and was passed by the two Houses of Congress by more than two-thirds majority, and is now a law on the statute-book.

That is the law. Any citizen of the United States, any man in this country who has as many as ten of the standard silver dollars of the United States is entitled to go to the Treasury and demand in exchange therefor a silver certificate for that amount, and silver certificates for any amount of standard silver dollars that he may have. That is an absolute right guaranteed by the law to every citizen of the United States.

There is a question here as to the conduct of the subtreasurer at New Orleans, as to whether he has denied this right to citizens of the United States; as to whether he has complied with this law or has violated it; as to whether his compliance with this law has been a technical compliance but a real violation of it. As throwing some light upon this subject, by which the line of conduct of the Treasurer may be read and understood, I read from his latest report, on page 24. He says:

The further issue of silver certificates should be discontinued, as being both expensive and useless. Issued to aid in the circulation of the standard silver dollar, these certificates have actually proved to be a hinderance to the carrying out of this purpose, and the circulation of this coin can not be increased to any greater extent than at present without the suppression of the issue of the certificates.

That is the opinion of the Treasurer as expressed in his report. Now read the correspondence furnished us in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury with the light thrown upon it by this report, and I submit to any Senator in this Chamber if it does not show that this officer has been guilty of a clear violation of the third section of the act of 1878, remonetizing silver, which I have just read. I have no taffy, Mr. President, for the man who violates the law, I care not whether he be Republican or Democrat. I have no excuse, no justification, no apology, no palliation for any man who defies the clearly expressed will of the people of this country as it stands upon the statute-book on this or any other question, and for one I propose, so far as my efforts can do it, to arraign the officer who is guilty of such violation before the bar of public justice and public opinion.

I am in receipt of letters from Texas which tell me that certain banks in that State are seeking to establish a discount upon silver because they can not get silver certificates from the subtreasury at New Orleans in exchange for silver dollars. I have that information from half a dozen sources in Texas. They can not get the certificates and they are actually seeking to establish a discount upon silver for that reason. Correspondence received by my colleague, and read here day before yesterday, shows that a bank at Paris, Tex., applied to the Treasury officers at New York to know if they would issue silver certificates or give bank notes for gold coin. This banker was willing to exchange gold coin for silver certificates redeemable in silver dollars, and could not get the exchange made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether there was any order of the President or the Department which authorized the subtreasurer at New Orleans to make such an exchange?

Mr. COKE. This was an application to the New York subtreasury.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to know if there was any such authority in the assistant treasurer at New York.

Mr. COKE. There was not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then could he make law?

Mr. COKE. No. There was no authority, because the authority had been previously withdrawn, not by the present Secretary of the Treasury but by his predecessor; yet it could have been restored by the present Secretary of the Treasury if he had desired to do so. So there was no law for this exchange, because the Secretary of the Treasury would not permit it to be done.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any statute of the United States which authorizes the paying out of silver certificates for gold? I ask for information.

Mr. COKE. I speak of the orders of the Department of the Treasury. There have been departmental orders authorizing that exchange and I presume they are in accordance with law. There has been as much as $80,000,000 in gold received for silver certificates, the exchange being made at the Treasury.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is not prepared to say, though, whether there is any such statute?

Mr. COKE. I presume these public officers acted in accordance with law in making the exchange.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask for information.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi simply to the fact that a few months ago the Department found the authority to exchange subsidiary silver coin for gold with a great flourish of trumpets as to the absolute necessity of doing so to save the Government from bankruptcy.

Mr. GEORGE. That does not answer my question. Is there any statute of the United States which authorizes the issuance of silver certificates for gold? That is the question I propounded.

Mr. COKE. I presume that there is a law for it, because the Secretaries of the Treasury have been doing it, and have actually received $80,000,000 of gold in exchange for silver certificates, as shown by official reports.

Mr. MAXEY. My colleague will permit me at this point to say that that order existed, as was stated, I believe, by yourself, Mr. President, until Mr. Folger, who was the last Secretary of the Treasury that I know of, who revoked the order which authorized the exchange of silver certificates for gold coin.

Mr. COKE. It was done by one of the predecessors of the present Secretary of the Treasury, but it is an order which the present Secretary can reinstate at any moment he chooses to do so, and exchange gold for silver certificates; but the subtreasurers are not permitted to do it. The banker at Paris, Tex., to whom I have referred, well known to my colleague, who has written to New York to make this exchange, has been answered that the exchange will not be made.

Now, these are the silver certificates for which the people are anxious to exchange gold, redeemable as they are in silver dollars, which certificates the Treasurer of the United States in a dogmatic way in his report says are mischievous and ought to be suppressed.

Indeed is it not known to everybody in this country that since 1878, when the silver coinage law was passed, every President, every Secretary of the Treasury, every Treasurer of the United States, while ostentatiously trying to make it appear that they were enforcing the law, have been really and in truth attempting and compassing its defeat and nullification! The conduct of the assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans in this case is of a piece with that of all of his predecessors from 1878 down to this time with reference to silver coin and silver certificates.

I must give the predecessor of the present subtreasurer at New Orleans the credit of having administered the office more satisfactorily to the people than his successor has done. We have not been informed that the clerical force in the subtreasury at New Orleans was greater under the former than the present incumbent; yet I have never heard of any bank or any individual complaining that they did not receive silver certificates promptly upon the presentation of the silver dollars until this complaint is made against the present subtreasurer in New Orleans.

Why is this? I have looked over the report of the Treasurer, but find nowhere that he asks for more clerical force. Let some one show where this gentleman asks Congress for a larger clerical force. The clerical force in the office when he went there was sufficient to accommodate the public with all the silver certificates that were sought to be obtained for silver dollars. Why is it not so now; and if he has not a sufficient clerical force, as he alleges, why has he not asked for a greater force?

But it is said that the two banks upon whose statement this complaint is made against the Treasurer sought to make the assistant treasurer at New Orleans an intermediary in making shipments to a New Orleans bank. There is no truth in that. Here is the letter of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans to the Treasurer of the United States, dated at New Orleans, January 2, 1886, in which instructions are asked from the Treasurer as to whether he shall receive the money shipped to him by these banks.

Turn over now to the next page, bearing in mind that this was written on the 2d of January, and we find the letter of Mr. T. R. Roach, cashier of the bank in New Orleans to which these silver dollars were shipped, bearing date also January 2, showing that he was on the ground there as the agent of these banks in the city of New Orleans to receive the certificates for this money; and yet the subtreasurer there says that he is sought to be made the intermediary between two banks. The agent of the New Orleans bank was on the ground when the silver dollars arrived, demanding the certificates, and was entitled to receive them just as if he had carried the silver to the subtreasury himself.

The third section of the act of 1878 says: "Any holder of the coin authorized by this act" is entitled to demand the certificates. Here stood Mr. Roach, agent of the bank for whose benefit the shipment was made, demanding the certificates for the money right on the ground at the time the money was received there.

Mr. CALL. It does not say so.

Mr. COKE. It does say so. Take Mr. Roach's letter published in the RECORD of yesterday, read by the Senator from Louisiana, and see whether that does not state that he was there. I will ask the Secretary to read the letter in full.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, January 25.

DEAR SIR: In view of your position on the silver question and the probability that Congress will ratify your opinions by their official action, it seems important that all impediments to the free use of silver and its unrestricted movement should be avoided so far as possible, and every portion of the country be provided with all possible facilities for giving silver circulation a fair test without the creation of prejudices against it from extrinsic causes.

That such a prejudice is growing up against it in this section is due to a cause that is within the easy power of Congress to remove, and I deem it due to your position and your views to state it frankly. As you are doubtless well aware, the States of Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Mississippi draw large quantities of standard dollars from the Treasury during the fall and early winter, in exchange for which the Treasury receives gold or its equivalent later in the season. The silver dollars having performed their part in moving the crops of cotton, rice, and sugar to market, seek to return to the Treasury until further needed in commerce and agriculture.

In lieu of the silver thus returned to the Treasury the holders do not ask back the gold they originally paid for it, but simply silver certificates for the amounts deposited. I am told that it has been the custom at all the subtreasuries to receive from country banks shipments of standard dollars, the certificates for which were delivered to the shipper's correspondent in the subtreasury city. I know this has been the case in New York, and last year in New Orleans also; besides which the banks of this city could deposit their surplus silver and receive certificates in the same manner.

This year, however, the subtreasury at this point declines to receive silver from the country banks, though the latter write me that this facility is still accorded them by other subtreasuries. In this the Treasurer of the United States sustains our assistant treasurer, and I therefore presume he is right as a matter of law. But the subtreasurer virtually refuses to receive it from depositors in this city also; that is to say, he so limits the amount and receives it so seldom that it is practically a refusal. I appreciate the subtreasurer's reason, which is that he has not an adequate clerical force to do the work that would fall upon his office should he receive deposits of these dollars as freely as offered. But this evil can be easily remedied by Congress granting him one or two more employés. This would but slightly increase the expenses of the office, but would be of immense benefit to the people by facilitating the free movement of silver, and when the people find that their surplus silver can be promptly converted into paper representatives of the coin at need they will be more likely to receive the coin freely and cheerfully than they will now that it is liable to become a dead weight of metal upon their hands.

It is becoming common for us to receive letters from country banks urging us to let them ship us standard dollars. To these we returned affirmative answers so long as we had room in our vaults to store it; but finally the point was reached where we could not receive further shipments unless the Treasury would receive more freely from us. The country banks thus clogged become naturally prejudiced against silver, and the longer the blockade continues the more likely they are to be confirmed in this feeling and to disseminate the infection to their customers. I commend this whole matter to you as one in which you are interested, and ask your early consideration.

Very respectfully, yours,

T. R. ROACH, Cashier.

Hon. JAMES B. EUSTIS,
United States Senate, Washington.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will allow, by unanimous consent, his bill to be informally laid aside until we conclude this discussion.

Mr. BLAIR. For how long a time?

Mr. CALL. It will not take a great while, I suppose.

Mr. BLAIR. I have learned from experience thus far on the school bill at this session to know that it is worth while to be definite, to have some understanding as to time.

Mr. CALL. I think it is due to the officers of the Government whose conduct has been questioned here that there should be allowed an immediate expression of opinion on the subject, and it will not seriously interfere with the Senator's bill.

Mr. COKE. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I have very little more to say, and shall soon be through.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to the educational bill being laid aside informally for fifteen minutes or half an hour to accommodate the Senator from Texas, but I do not feel that it ought to be laid aside informally for a longer time.

Mr. TELLER. A Senator who is not now on the floor desires to address the Senate on the educational bill, and as the Senator in charge of the bill I do not think would care about pressing it to-day, I move that it be made the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR. I can not consent to such a motion as that; a special order is so easily displaced, and there is no occasion for delay. If the Senator from Texas desires to speak longer, the Senator who desires to speak against the school bill knew very well that I wished to proceed with it at 2 o'clock, and he only wished to understand what the course of action would be. I am not aware that either the friends or opponents of the bill care for further delay.

Mr. CALL. I want to make an appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire. There are a number of the friends of his bill on this side who desire to be heard on the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana, and it will not seriously interfere with the progress of his bill to allow it to be informally laid aside.

Mr. BLAIR. It does seem to interfere. I gave notice that the bill would be pressed early in the session. It was about the fourth on the Calendar. It was displaced by the Dakota bill, which I suppose has no more chance of becoming a law at this session than there is probability of our re-enacting the laws of the Medes and Persians. This bill is of all the bills pending in this Congress at the present time the one that should be early acted upon, if at all, because it should reach the other House so that that body may either adopt or reject it, and if they do adopt it, and it should become a law by the signature of the President, that its provisions may be available for the benefit of the children of the country this year. It is quite a serious thing to a boy who gets only four or five months' schooling at the most in a year, and perhaps only three, that for one year the benefits of the bill should be taken away from him. Therefore I feel that I am excusable if I push this bill with something of the pertinacity that other Senators exhibit in the management of measures with which they are intrusted.

As to the discussion of the silver question which is going on, nobody will ever know or find out from that whether the Secretary of the Treasury is to be blamed or not to be blamed. That question will be decided according as people think upon the silver question at large, and it can wait. The resolution is brought in here as a side show, and is absorbing the time of the Senate without ever having passed through any of those preliminary stages to which other business is obliged to submit. I hope that those who are interested in the further discussion of the resolution will be satisfied if I should simply assent that the Senator from Texas may complete his remarks, which I suppose from what he says will not take much longer time.

Mr. COKE. I desire to occupy the floor for only a few minutes longer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from New Hampshire must see that that course would be very unfair to the officers of the Government who are criticised to some extent by the Senator from Texas. If there is any Senator who wishes in defense of the officers of the Government who are thus criticised to reply to the Senator from Texas it is eminently proper that they should have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. BLAIR. The Secretary of the Treasury has been assailed and defended, defended and assailed, and the process may go on interminably. I can hardly be appealed to, I think, with any great warmth or eagerness to do more than I have stated. I am willing that the Senator from Texas shall proceed to the completion of his remarks.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not expect to participate at all in the discussion of the resolution that is under consideration, but I think there is a reason why the Senator from New Hampshire ought to consent to have his bill made the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock. The Senator yesterday spoke, I think, about fifteen minutes, and this morning we find spread upon the RECORD a speech of forty-six pages, closely printed, with a large amount of statistics in it. For one, I have not had any opportunity—not a copy of the RECORD having reached my house this morning until after breakfast—to examine into those great statistical masses of information, which are very necessary to a proper understanding of the bill. They are the support and foundation of the bill, as I understand it, and one can scarcely be expected to answer the bill intelligently, or any of its features, at least its main features, unless he is enabled to familiarize himself with this great body of statistics.

It is very true that some of these figures were in the RECORD before. The Senator from New Hampshire made a very elaborate report, with tabulated statements, when a similar bill was before the Senate two years ago, and we had the opportunity of getting all the information which those tables furnished us and which his speech furnished us. That is now reproduced entire in the RECORD, but there is added to that quite an array of statistical information which I suppose brings the case down to date. Really, I must say to the Senator, I am desirous to make my own position understood to my constituents, which I could do if I had an opportunity of looking into this matter as I should like.

Mr. BLAIR. I was not aware that any Senator cared for the delay of the school bill for the purpose of examining the subject with reference to its discussion. If there is a general feeling like that which the Senator from Alabama has expressed here I shall ask unanimous consent that the school bill be the unfinished business for to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock; that the bill shall stand to-morrow precisely as it stands to-day, with the understanding that I shall feel obliged to press the consideration of the bill at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the school bill be laid aside informally and be considered the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR. No, the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the bill be the unfinished business to-morrow at 2 o'clock. If there be no objection it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none.

SILVER DEPOSITS AT SUBTREASURIES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. EUSTIS February 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the letter I had read from Mr. Roach, the cashier of the national bank at New Orleans, taken in connection with his letters in the correspondence furnished us by the Secretary of the Treasury, shows that he was on the ground ready to receive silver certificates, which ought to have been issued for the silver dollars sent to him by the banks at Waco, Tex., and Memphis, Tenn. He was there. His letter furnished us in this correspondence is dated the 2d of January, while the letter of the assistant treasurer to the Treasurer of the United States asking for instructions on the subject bears exactly the same date. There is no question of the subtreasury becoming an intermediary at all. The silver was shipped by the Tennessee and Texas banks to the subtreasury with directions to issue the certificates and hand them over to the New Orleans bank, and there was Mr. Roach, the cashier of the bank, ready to receive them. This correspondence shows that; and the letter just read shows that the Treasurer absolutely refused to issue silver certificates to New Orleans people who carried the money to the subtreasury for the purpose of making the exchange. He says that the conduct of the assistant treasurer there—and that he is a business man in good standing in the city of New Orleans has been vouched for by the Senator from Louisiana—is a practical refusal to execute the law of 1878 in this regard.

That is the proposition that I set out to establish. Here is this New Orleans banker, who states facts to show a practical refusal by the subtreasurer at New Orleans to execute the law of 1878, and the Treasurer here at Washington, in the letter he has furnished us, has approved the conduct of the subtreasurer. That is all there is about it.

Now, the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana proposes to inquire into this matter, to find out how it is and why it is that this law is being nullified, as this information to him says it is and as information to myself from citizens of Texas says is being done. It is a matter that ought to be inquired into. The people have expressed themselves in every form in which their wishes can be voiced in favor of silver coinage. They have shown a fixedness of purpose in holding on to silver coinage that has not been shown with reference to any other great measure in this country for many years. Yet we find the executive officers of the Government making a systematic war upon this coinage in contempt of the popular will and in contempt of an express law upon the statute-book. It ought to be inquired into, and the inquiry ought to result in something else than mere inquiry if the facts as they seem to be now show a violation of this law.

Mr. President, there was something said here yesterday about an attack on the administration. I helped to put this administration in power in a humble way. I represent, in connection with my colleague, two million and a half of people, who gave 134,000 popular majority for the Democratic ticket, the largest Democratic majority in any State in the Union. There are two hundred and forty-odd newspapers published in that State, and I know of but four that sustain the action of the executive department of the Government in its war upon silver. I stand here as a representative of a solid sentiment in a great Democratic State in behalf of the continued coinage of silver and its fair treatment as money. I make no war on the administration; but I believe that public office is a public trust, and I execute the trust confided to me by the people of Texas in maintaining their wishes upon the floor of the Senate, let who may be opposed to them. Making war on the administration when the people of three or four States in the South are complaining that the money of the country, the only money that circulates among them, is being discounted because of the violation of the plain provisions of a positive law by one of the officers of the Government put there to enforce it! Is that war upon the administration? I would be unworthy of my seat here if I failed to say what I have said, if I failed to do what I have done. As long as I am here, I care not who it is or what administration it is that thwarts the will of the people as expressed upon the statute-books of the country, I shall in my humble way call them to account for it before the country.

Here are silver certificates sought for by the people, asked for, gold coin tendered for them, and here is a subordinate executive officer declaring to Congress that they are mischievous and useless and ought to be suppressed, and he is using his power as Treasurer of the United States in a disingenuous and indirect way to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Texas, I think, is making one mistake, if he will allow me to interrupt him. The Secretary of the Treasury is the superior officer of the Treasurer, and November 1, 1881, he prohibited the further issue of silver certificates for gold coin.

Mr. COKE. I understand that. I am not alluding to that fact.

Mr. BECK. The communication being addressed to the Treasurer, the Treasurer properly declined, because until his superior officer gives him the authority he can not do it; and therefore his answer was proper.

Mr. COKE. I was not alluding to the issuance of silver certificates. I merely stated the fact that here were silver certificates sought for and gold coin tendered for them, and here was an officer of the Government at New Orleans obstructing the issuance of certificates to the injury of the circulating medium of the country and in defiance of the law which he has been sworn to execute.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say one other word, if the Senator from Texas will allow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. It is narrowed down to this in regard to the resolution: If silver coin was tendered and silver certificates demanded, then under the third section of the act of 1878 I think the officials were in default in not issuing them; but if it was to be a deposit and a receipt to be given for it, and not certificates to be used as money, then I think they were not in default.

Mr. COKE. I understand that; I have already answered that.

Mr. BECK. One moment longer and I will make it plain so that the Senator will get my idea. If the certificate required to be given was one which if lost or destroyed or burned up made the silver deposited the property of the United States, then they had no right to refuse them. If, however, the certificate was required which although lost or destroyed enabled the men who deposited the silver to demand the silver, then the officers had no right to give it. It all depends on that.

Mr. COKE. The Senator from Kentucky is conjuring up excuses for this treasurer that are not valid or substantial, because the silver dollars were transmitted by express by the Texas and Tennessee banks to New Orleans to the subtreasury with directions to issue the silver certificates and hand them over to the New Orleans bank, and the agent of the New Orleans bank, as is shown by the correspondence here, was on the ground ready to receive them. He was there ready to receive them, and the letter of Mr. Roach goes beyond that. He says there has been a practical refusal to deliver silver certificates in exchange for silver dollars to the people and to the banks of the city of New Orleans outside of the transaction about which we have been talking, of the Tennessee and Texas banks.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does Mr. Roach give any instance of that? Is not that an inference from the fact that the exchange was not made for the Memphis and Waco banks?

Mr. COKE. Here is the statement:

> The subtreasury at this point declines to receive silver from the country banks, though the latter write me that this facility is still accorded them by other subtreasuries. In this the Treasurer of the United States sustains our assistant treasurer, and I therefore presume he is right as a matter of law. But the subtreasurer virtually refuses to receive it from depositors in this city also—that is to say, he so limits the amount and receives it so seldom that it is practically a refusal. I appreciate the subtreasurer's reason, which is that he has not an adequate clerical force to do the work that would fall upon his office should he receive deposits of these dollars as freely as offered.

Has he ever asked for additional assistance? Nobody has ever heard of it if he has.

> But this evil can be easily remedied by Congress granting him one or two more employés.
> The country banks, thus clogged, become naturally prejudiced against silver, and the longer the blockade continues the more likely they are to be confirmed in this feeling and to disseminate the infection to their customers. I commend the whole matter to you as one in which you are interested, and ask your early consideration.

Mr. President, no Senator can look at this correspondence, can look at this report, can review the reports of the executive department of the Government on this question, can look back and see the reports of all the Secretaries of the Treasury and Treasurers since 1878, without coming to the conclusion that this trouble at New Orleans now is simply a part and parcel and piece of a general war that has been carried on against silver coinage since silver was remonetized in 1878. No other conclusion can be arrived at. Why was it, as I asked a while ago, that this difficulty never occurred before? Is there not the same number of clerks there now that were there before Mr. Jordan came into office?

Mr. GEORGE. There is an important point on that subject stated by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] that $25,000 had been lost to the Government. He made that statement here.

Mr. COKE. That is not in this correspondence.

Mr. GEORGE. The fact was stated by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] in his speech that $25,000 had been lost to the Government between the time of this illegal deposit and the counting and certification. That was the reason, I should think, for the charge of an illegal policy.

Mr. EUSTIS. Does the Senator say that twenty-five thousand silver dollars were lost?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Florida made the statement.

Mr. COKE. In what report is that found?

Mr. CALL. The Treasurer stated to me this morning that $25,000 had been lost.

Mr. EUSTIS. I asked if they were silver dollars.

Mr. CALL. His statement to me was that twenty-five thousand silver dollars, not counted, but to be afterwards counted and certified, had been lost in consequence of that practice at New Orleans.

Mr. COKE. Has he ever made any public report on the fact?

Mr. CALL. I do not know. He stated it to me this morning.

Mr. COKE. That is the first I have ever heard of it. I have read the reports, and have seen nothing of any such loss reported.

Mr. PLATT. I wish, with the consent of the Senator from Texas, that the Senator from Florida would explain what he means by "lost." Does he mean that there has been a defalcation, or, in what sense has there been a loss?

Mr. CALL. Yes, I think it was a defalcation. I think it was by virtue of want of strict accountability, as the Treasurer expressed it, in which that amount was claimed, and appeared from the evidence, I suppose, to have been really deposited. I think perhaps it was subsequently ascertained that it had been appropriated by an officer in charge of it. That is what I understand from the statement to me.

Mr. COKE. A loss occurring in that way presents no argument against the system. They ought to have honest men in the offices. Thieves and rogues will steal money under the best system in the world.

Now, sir, I have very little more to say. The Senator from Louisiana has introduced a resolution asking an inquiry into this subject. The subject-matter of that resolution affects my State as well as his. I have clear, decided convictions upon the subject, and I have given expression to them, and that is that the executive department of our Government since 1878 have in every possible and conceivable way dishonored and degraded silver, that they have refused to pay it out to the public creditors, and that they availed themselves of technicalities and pretexts anywhere and everywhere on all occasions to injure this currency and reduce it in value and prevent its circulation while professing to sustain it. I think it is a subject that ought to be inquired into with a view to further proceedings, if the facts justify them.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] put a question to the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] which I ventured in part to answer, and now I desire to answer it fully. He inquired whether there was any authority under the law to exchange gold for silver certificates. I called his attention to the fact that early last summer there was a great commotion made in financial circles with reference to the lack of gold in the Treasury, and that the Department had felt it incumbent on them to buy (for that is all it could be, and it could be defended upon no other system than that it was buying) a quantity of gold, which they paid for in subsidiary silver as less desirable currency to hold than any other class of money they had. I understand the system of issuing silver certificates for gold coin, adopted early in 1880, was upon the theory that the Government had the right to pay out the silver certificates that had come in and thus buy gold, or exchange one kind of money for another. If the transaction to which I have referred of last summer can be defended at all, it is either upon the theory that the Government had the right to take the money in the Treasury and buy gold, or that it had the right to exchange one kind of money for another. Upon either it might probably be defensible, at least so far as to justify the officer, if there was a necessity for receiving more gold than the Government had on hand.

At the time this bank proposed to exchange its gold for silver certificates or for national notes, either or both, the Government of the United States had almost $34,000,000 of silver certificates that might have been exchanged properly under the law for gold, that might have been paid out for any purpose that the Government saw fit to pay them, because the act of 1878 providing for the coinage declared also that the silver certificates might be reissued when they came into the Treasury.

In addition to that, they had at or about that time, as I find by the statement sent out from the Treasury Department dated the 30th day of January, 1886, $47,893,388 of national notes in the Treasury that might also have been exchanged for gold if it was so very desirable to receive gold. The fact was, if gold came into the Treasury in any great quantities the great argument, the great bugbear that has been held up before the people that we were to reach a silver basis, would be gone. It has been the stock in trade, as I once before said, of all those who were attacking the coinage of the silver dollar, that we can not be bimetallists, that we have got to have either a single standard of gold or a single standard of silver. I said the other day that every declaration which had come from the financial department of the Government since the act was passed had been to that effect. It has been intensified within the last nine or ten months; I might say that within the last year it has been intensified.

We can not have forgotten that just before the inauguration of the present Executive a tremendous effort was made to convince the House of Representatives that there was a great financial crisis approaching and that unless the House and the Senate consented to strike down the coinage of the silver dollar we should be upon a silver basis, and would be bankrupt as a nation and disgraced in our credit. A new administration was coming in. The people who had elected it had been out of power for twenty-four years. It is not saying anything to their discredit when it is said that they had high expectations of the benefits and advantages they were to receive by the incoming of this administration. They had a majority in the House of Representatives representing the popular will. The President-elect appealed by letter to the members of Congress representing the same political faith as his own for legislation which he said in substance if accomplished would not only greatly benefit the country, but would benefit the political party of which he was the incoming President. How did the House of Representatives respond to that appeal? I will not say now whether it was a proper and worthy appeal. Admit that it was a proper appeal, as the President believed it to be, how did the House of Representatives respond to that appeal? The great mass of the men who had put their shoulders to the wheel and elected him President responded not only in an official way, but by letter, that their constituents believed that the coinage of the silver dollar was essential to public prosperity, and that they indorsed the sentiments of their constituents; and they declined.

I have heard in these later days people talk about the degeneracy of public morals and the subserviency of public servants to patronage and to executive influence. There never has been since civilized countries were governed by republican institutions or by institutions where the people expressed their will so exalted an example of the independence of the people as was exhibited by the Democratic members of the House of Representatives in the spring of 1885. They scorned to be in accord with the Executive. They said, "We will deprive ourselves of that which every politician knows is so advantageous and so dear to be in harmony with the administration, because, in our judgment, the public weal demands that we should do otherwise."

It did seem to me that the incoming administration, out of respect and regard for that great high moral position taken by their own party, ought to have said, "We will at least treat the subject with candor and with fairness, and will not attempt to use the great power that you put in our hands to strike down what you say is a great interest and necessary for the public weal and public welfare." The House of Representatives rose to the occasion; the administration fell very far below.

I took occasion day before yesterday to speak of the lack of experience of the present financial minister of this administration. I supposed that the members of this body and the members of the other were a co-ordinate branch of the Government, with a right to criticise the administration whenever in their judgment it should be departing from the true line of financial or any other policy. I find myself taken to task by a Senator on this floor, who says that I made an unfair attack. What did I say? I simply said that the man who now holds the position of financial minister of the Government never had such training in financial affairs as justified him to speak ex cathedra, to speak with the air of a king or an emperor and say "thus it must be done." I said that there were men on this floor who had given weeks and months of thought to this subject where he could not have given one. I did not say it was necessary that he should have been a member of Congress. I have no doubt that there are members of the other House and members of the Senate who have failed to give much attention to this question or have failed to grasp it if they did give it such attention.

I make no attack upon the administration not justified by their own record and by their declarations put out in an official way. I have said nothing of private interviews or personal correspondence with members of the administration, which I might, if I chose, criticise, as has been done on this floor. I was content to take them on their record that they had sent here for our consideration.

The Senator who appears as the champion of the administration declares that he is for silver. If he is for silver, I suppose it is because he believes that that is the interest of the people. I suppose if he is in favor of the coinage of silver it is because he believes that that will insure prosperity to the people of the United States. I suppose he is for silver from conviction. A moment later he said: "I wish to say to the Senator representing the State that produces the most silver that the way to strike down and destroy that interest is to attack men in high places." Has it come to this, that the effort which has been made all over the country to destroy this interest and to strike down not simply the silver interest in the country, but to strike down one of the money metals of the world, is to be transferred to this floor in the shape of a threat? What is to be done? If my position is logical that the interests of the country require the coinage of two kinds of money—and the Senator admitted that himself—because I may speak unkindly, harshly, or even improperly of a public officer, is that public officer here by his champion to say that this great interest is to be stricken down in vengeance to punish me for what he considers is a dereliction of duty on my part?

Mr. President, threats of this kind are unworthy of this Chamber, and they come without any harm, so far at least as I am concerned. I shall at all times do with this administration what I have been ready to do with any administration, whether it was in sympathy with my political views or against them. I shall criticise it whenever in my judgment it is deserving of criticism, and I shall commend it whenever in my judgment it is worthy of commendation. The people of the silver regions are not here demanding that the silver interests of the West shall be promoted to the exclusion of any other interest. They are not here to compel the purchase of silver so that silver miners may receive 5, 10, or 20 cents more an ounce for their bullion. They look beyond that interest. I think I may speak for every man representing a silver-producing constituency on this floor when I say that if we did not believe that the great interests of the country and the world were involved in this question we should not be dinning again and again into the ears of perhaps a reluctant and unwilling Senate, part of the time at least, our views upon this subject; but they realize that it is more than a question whether the miners of Colorado shall receive $1.25 an ounce for their silver or whether they shall receive a dollar. It is more than that. They realize besides that the entire power of fifty million people has been for the last ten years steadily and sternly arrayed against the proposition to do the business of this country with the two metals. They knew in 1878 that they had to encounter a hostile administration in the execution of this law, a law put upon our statute-books after a more thorough examination, consideration, discussion, and debate than any other statute, I think, of a financial character that ever went into the books. When it passed this body and the other House it went to the Executive, and it there met with an executive veto. It was not a political question then and it is not now. It came back to this body and to the other, and in each branch of Congress it received the approval of more than two-thirds and it became a law. I say they knew then that they had to encounter in the execution of the law the administration then in existence backed by the whole financial power of the Government, and that they were wielding the influence given them by fifty million people to thwart and subvert and destroy the will of the people as legally expressed.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Is not that same remark applicable to the last administration?

Mr. TELLER. I was applying the remark to the last administration. I apply it to every administration that has existed since the passage of that law. Unless we may except a few months in the spring of 1881, there has been no time at the head of the financial department of the Government men who were anxious to execute the law in the spirit and in the letter of it. We did not expect that they would execute it in the spirit, but we had a right to demand that they should execute it in the letter; and that has not been done, in my judgment. I do not arraign this administration any more than I have arraigned preceding administrations, except that I do think perhaps in the later days, discouraged a little by the persistency perhaps of the silver people, there has been a little more anxiety and activity in the last year to strike down silver than ever before; and it has not been confined to the executive department; it has been in the financial circles just as well, and the executive department has caught its inspiration, if I may so speak, from the financial circle, where they have been as determined that the silver dollar should be destroyed as they ever were and a good deal more than ever before.

It is said that there has been no violation of the law at New Orleans. I was about to say the flimsy excuse, but it might be considered disrespectful to the gentleman who used it, and I say simply the excuse is made here for the failure to do what would have been done at all times if there had been a friendly administration and what was done when there was not a friendly administration—it is said the excuse for it is that there is not a sufficient clerical force. The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] said that I was responsible for the appointment of the predecessor of the present officer at New Orleans; that I was a part and parcel of the administration that appointed him. I do not understand that I was especially responsible for the appointment. I do not think I was consulted in regard to it, and if I had been consulted I do not understand that any blame of this character has been attached to the late officer at New Orleans. It is against the present officer and him alone, as I understand, that this charge is alleged. Against that officer no complaint had been alleged. Nobody complained that he did not succeed in doing exactly what we now complain is not being done. So the charge that I was responsible for him is not a very weighty charge, because there is no complaint as to his conduct. It was stated a few moments ago that there was a defalcation at the subtreasury at New Orleans. I do not know whether that defalcation was under the old or under the new officer.

Mr. EUSTIS. It was under the old officer.

Mr. TELLER. But whether there has been a defalcation or whether there has not, that has nothing in the world to do with this question of receiving silver dollars and paying out silver certificates. If it was under the old officer, it could not have arisen from this method of doing business any more than it could under the new one. If there was a defalcation, it occurred because the officer was not honest; and I trust that the friends of the gold dollar and the monometallists on this floor, the enemies of the silver dollar, do not propose to charge up to our side all the defalcations which have occurred or which may hereafter occur in connection with the handling of the silver dollar. We have been able to stand a good deal from the other side and we have stood it pretty patiently, but we shall certainly enter a protest when the silver dollar is to be charged with all the defalcations in the past and with all that are to occur in the future.

I wish to recur for a moment to the criticism which I made upon the Secretary of the Treasury. I hold that there should be at least courteous treatment of the executive officers of the Government by the members of this body. I hold, on the other hand, that the executive officers of the Government are bound by the same law with reference to the legislative department that the members of the legislative department are bound with reference to the members of the executive department. A bitter attack, it is said, has been made upon the Secretary of the Treasury. What has been said? Simply that he had failed to execute the law. That is the sum and substance of it, put it as you will. I did say something to the effect that the Treasury Department are depreciating the money of the realm. I did say that it had been supposed to be an offense against law and good morals to degrade the money of the country. Why? Because by such degradation you take out of the people a portion at least of what they had a right to expect when they took the money.

There are one hundred and forty million silver dollars in circulation, or thereabouts; and if the Treasury Department depreciate them 20 per cent. because they destroy the confidence of the people, they have taken a large amount of money out of the people who are the legitimate holders of the money. It may be distinguished in law, and undoubtedly is, from the debasement of coin with alloy, but in morals I deny that there is a particle of difference; and I deny that the people who take the dollar and who lose it are any worse off than when the Government shall put four or five grains (or whatever may be necessary to bring it down) of alloy and compel them to take it, when the Government itself thus depreciates and destroys the commercial value of its money. If that is an improper criticism of the Treasury Department I shall stand convicted. I shall deal with the Treasury Department as I think it ought to be dealt with, giving to it, as I said before, praise where it is due and condemning it wherever it deserves condemnation.

I alluded day before yesterday to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. I said something which I need not repeat now to the effect that he is not charged with any policy of this character—that this body and the other are charged with that. How courteous he is when he addresses Congress upon the question of their legislation. Let me read. The Secretary of the Treasury says in his report:

1. The act of February 28, 1878, which has been construed as a permanent appropriation for perpetual Treasury purchases of at least $24,000,000 worth of silver per annum, although from causes mostly foreign that metal is now of mutable and falling value—

Mostly foreign, foreign to the metal, but not foreign to the administration of public affairs in this country—which must be manufactured into coins of unlimited legal tender and issued to the people of the United States as equivalents of our monetary unit.

The act of May 31, 1878—

Which I suppose all Senators on this floor will recognize as the act which provided that no more legal tenders should be canceled and retired; that is the act of which he speaks, and he says:

The act of May 31, 1878, which indefinitely postponed fulfillment of the solemn pledge (March 18, 1869) not only of "redemption" but also of "payment" of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, legalized as $346,000,000 paper money of unlimited legal tender, and required the post-redemption issue and reissue of these promises to pay dollars, as equivalents of our monetary unit.

Now, I call the attention of the Senate further to the concluding remarks upon this question. Here are two statutes passed by Congress, laws upon the statute-book, which this Secretary of the Treasury swore he would execute. He says:

But these two evils, which are each a separate menace to the public tranquillity and injurious to the public morals and the public faith.

It is a declaration on his part that the legislative department of the country legislated against public tranquillity and against public morals and to the destruction of the public faith or public credit. I think a Secretary of the Treasury who sends out such a document need not be oversensitive, nor need his friends rush to his defense unnecessarily and hastily with cheap and bald excuses for what I think is a plain violation of law. You can hardly expect that any man will execute a law that he believes to be contrary to good morals and injurious to the public honor and the public credit, and I think his friends would do better upon this floor and elsewhere if they would admit that he does not attempt to execute the law except in the very compulsory provisions thereof; and I am told from good authority that he has not even done that, irrespective of the question now presented for consideration. I am told that the records will show that there have not been coined every month two million silver dollars. I am told that the aggregate coined will not quite foot up to $24,000,000 per annum. It is true it is not very much less; I am told only two or three hundred thousand dollars; but that is a mandatory law; it is what the President in his message calls a compulsory coinage of silver.

It is offensive, it may be, to use the word "compulsory." It usually is. I spoke of that the other day. I do not desire to continue on that line at any great length, except to say again that I do not understand that it is the proper term when we enact a law for an officer to say it is a compulsory statute. All statutes are compulsory; they require obedience, and they require it of the man who carries brick from the ground to the building in his hod with no more exactness and with no more vigor than they require it of the man who resides in the Executive Mansion or who presides over the Financial Department of the Government. "Compulsory laws! All laws are compulsory; and when we said by our legislative enactments that silver should be coined in this country under certain restrictions there was an obligation on every department of the Government to execute that law in accordance both with the letter and the spirit of the act.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator if he understands that the President used that phrase in any other sense than to distinguish the coinage of the $2,000,000 a month, which is absolutely required, from the discretion given to the officers of the Government of coining a larger sum than $24,000,000 a year at their election? I presume the Senator has been more a student of this matter than I have, but I suppose the President used that phrase not with a view of imputing any tyranny or improper exercise of arbitrary power to the law-making authority, but only to distinguish what is an absolute requirement from a discretion.

Mr. TELLER. I can not say exactly how the President of the United States uses the term. I believe he does not allow that he is amenable to us for his reasons. I simply take what he says. I find that not only the President but other officers of the Government speak of this as a compulsory provision. Exactly what they mean I do not undertake to say, except that in every case where it is spoken of it is by way of complaint. It is not an adjective put on the law to make it acceptable; it is not a praiseworthy adjective; it is a condemnatory one. I do not desire to confine my remarks especially to this act, but I say the execution of this law has been treated all the way through as a thing that ought not to have been done, a harsh measure upon the executive department of the Government, contrary to its will, by the legislative department.

There are some other questions I should like to present, but it seems to me that upon the pending resolution it is not worth while. I suppose nobody will be found on this floor to vote against the resolution. I do not suppose when it comes from the committee that we shall have any facts that we have not now got. I think perhaps if the committee would go into an examination for the purpose of determining the animus of this denial they might find in very many cases convincing proof to honest minds that not only the Treasurer but the Secretary of the Treasury and every subordinate branch of that great Department that has touched this question has touched it in such a way as to make if possible the people disgusted with the execution of the law.

I have had occasion to speak on this floor once before of the statement which goes out that only $50,000,000 of this silver is in actual circulation. The President of the United States gave it out in that way; the Secretary of the Treasury gives it out in that way; the Comptroller of the Currency gives it out in that way. I said the other day that they always follow with an explanation that there were some certificates out, but the explanation rarely reaches the people. The declaration that $50,000,000 only are in circulation is the one that strikes the public eye, and many and many a man who has read the President's message has overlooked the subsequent statement that some silver certificates had been issued. What difference does it make whether the silver dollar circulates in that way or whether it circulates by the silver certificate? The other day the Senator from Vermont inquired if the complaint against the late administration had not been that they would not circulate the silver dollar, and whether the complaint now is not that the present administration insists upon circulating the silver dollar. There is as much circulation of the silver dollar when the silver certificate goes into public use as there is of the silver dollar, and if there has been a change in the policy of the Government with reference to that, it has been because they believe that the issuing of the dollar, cumbersome and burdensome as it is, would render it objectionable to the people, and would further their ends toward discontinuing its coinage.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I suppose it is well known to the Senators here who have taken the trouble to ascertain what my opinions are on the subject of silver, that I do not agree with the financial policy of the administration upon that particular subject. Very nearly two years ago, in the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, I had occasion to express my views upon the silver coinage of the country, and also to express some views in relation to the action of the executive department of the Government in relation to silver, and I may say here that if a proposition which I made then had received the sanction of Congress we would have been relieved to a very considerable extent of the trouble about which we are discussing now.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his remarks the other day showed the necessity for some new legislation on the subject of silver certificates. He showed that at certain seasons of the year there was a great demand in the South and in the West for silver dollars; not for silver dollars per se, but for small currency, one and two dollar bills, or a coinage of $1. He also showed that after the crops had been gathered and the laborers had been paid and had spent their money those silver dollars came back to the great commercial centers of the country and became in the banks a burden, and therefore they desired to exchange them for silver certificates. In the early part of the season silver certificates would be presented for redemption, so that silver dollars might be had in order to go into the country, there being no silver certificate of a less denomination than $10. After the crops had been gathered and the money had flowed back to the commercial centers, then that operation was reversed. In the first place, silver certificates were presented to the Treasury to get silver dollars to go into the country.

In the next place, silver dollars were presented for silver certificates on account of the bulk of silver and the difficulty of storing it; so that this see-saw operation was going on at different periods of the year. At one season the small change needed for the purpose of paying laborers in the country was demanded for shipment into the country; at another season the silver dollars flowed back into the commercial centers, and then for convenience came the demand for the certificates. So, if there had been an authorization by Congress that silver certificates in one and two dollars and five-dollar bills should be issued by the Treasury, the silver would never have been disturbed from its lodging place in the vaults of the Treasury of the United States, because these small silver certificates would have gone to the country and performed all the offices which the silver dollars would have performed, and when they would return to the great commercial centers there would be no occasion on account of their bulk and their weight to deposit them in the United States Treasury. So it seems that if there has been trouble about this thing, if the people of this country have not had their wishes carried out with reference to silver certificates it is in a large degree owing to the fault of Congress in not passing the necessary legislation. This I say by way of premise to the few remarks I intend to submit.

I shall not go into the wide field into which I have been invited by this debate to inquire what has been the general policy of the administration in reference to silver. I take it I shall perform my duty when I shall have discussed the real question presented by the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] and by the report which has been made by the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to that resolution.

The Senator from Texas who sits before me [Mr. COKE] has stated the issue upon his side in about this way: That there has been on the part of the Treasury of the United States an open and flagrant violation of the law of the land. I propose to address some remarks to the Senate upon that issue. So far as I am able to ascertain—and I think I have been able to ascertain very clearly what is the action of the Treasury Department upon the subject—that action has been in strict subordination to law. It may not have been what gentlemen may have desired it to be, but it was at least such action as was authorized by law, and the action which the assistant treasurer at New Orleans was asked to take, and which he is now denounced for not taking, would have been in violation of law. So I assert, in opposition to the position assumed by the Senator from Texas, that the action of the Treasury has not only not been in violation of law, but if the non-action complained of had really taken place it would have been in violation of law.

Whatever may be the private or official views of the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to silver—and, so far as I understand them, they differ from mine—he is entitled at the hands of the Senate, he is entitled before the country and from those who differ from him in reference to those opinions, to be tried at least by the law of the land. What that law is I read from the RECORD as it was put there by my friend who sits before me:

> Any holder of the coin authorized by this act—
> That is, the silver dollar—
> may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums not less than $10, and receive therefor—

What? At New Orleans the complaint and the demand were that the holder making the deposit should receive a receipt from the treasurer for so many dollars estimated, but "subject to count." That was the operation attempted to be performed at New Orleans as disclosed by this record. A bank in the country ships $25,000 directly to the assistant treasurer at New Orleans on account of a bank at New Orleans. The money is presented to the assistant treasurer by the agent of the express company. He has no authority to receive silver certificates for it; he does not demand silver certificates for it. He asks for a receipt for so many dollars "subject to count."

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir. If I am wrong about the fact I desire to be corrected, but I am certainly not wrong about the law.

Mr. COKE. The Senator is entirely wrong about the facts. Does not the correspondence show that it had been the custom uniformly to send silver dollars to the subtreasury in that way and exchange them for silver certificates?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; but——

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator further if there can be any conceivable reason for sending silver dollars to the subtreasury at New Orleans for any other purpose in God's world than to be exchanged for silver certificates?

Mr. GEORGE. Are you through with your question?

Mr. COKE. I ask you that.

Mr. GEORGE. Whenever you get through with your questions I will answer.

Mr. COKE. I ask that question. Do you know any other reason for which silver dollars are sent to a subtreasury by a bank except for exchange for silver certificates, unless it be in payment of a debt?

Mr. GEORGE. Are you through with your questions?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, I will answer. The first question which the Senator from Texas propounded to me is, Does not this correspondence show that the custom under former administrations had been to receive silver from the express companies and give receipts therefor "subject to count," and afterward issue silver certificates? I say it does; but we are not trying the Secretary of the Treasury by an illegal and unauthorized custom which grew up under a former administration; we are trying him by the law of the land, and that is what the Senator in his speech said he had violated and not a custom. I say that custom was illegal, because it was not authorized by law and it was in violation of law.

Mr. COKE. Has the Senator the law?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir, I have the law before me, and I will read it. Let us see what the law says. The Senator says that this custom which had grown up under a former administration was in accordance with law and not in violation of it, and upon that I take issue, and I will see who is right by the statute.

Mr. COKE. There is no law of Congress which forbids it.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator now says there is no law which forbids it. For a States-rights Democrat and a strict constructionist like my friend from Texas is to assume that the Treasurer of the United States may do what he pleases with the money of the United States unless there is a positive statute prohibiting it is a little singular. I thought when the law was laid down plainly in affirmative terms, prescribing the duty of an officer in reference to the currency of the country, and especially with reference to the treasure of the country, that law furnished the rule for the officer's action, and when he did not act in accordance with that law he acted in violation of it without any express prohibition contained in the statute. I will read again:

That any holder—

Yes, "any holder." An expressman may do it. I do not say the owner of the coin must put it there, but he must be a lawful holder. I do not say it requires the man who owns the money to put it there, but he must have, of course, lawful authority to put it there. He may be an agent, and if he has lawful authority as an agent, and therefore is a lawful holder of the coin, he may deposit it. What is he to receive for it when he does deposit it? The Senator from Texas and the other Senators who have criticised the action of the Treasurer upon this subject say that he ought to give, not that which it is specified in the statute he shall give, but give something else, and that it is the burden of Mr. Roach's complaint that he ought to give a receipt, "subject to count." Let us see what the statute says he shall give:

SEC. 3. That any holder of the coin authorized by this act may deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums not less than $10, and receive therefor certificates of not less than $10 each.

Certificates of not less than $10 each—corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes.

He can not issue any sort of a certificate; he is obliged to issue certificates of the denominations of not less than $10 and of the denominations of the United States notes. It must be a $10 certificate, or a $20 certificate, or a $50 certificate, or a $100 certificate, or a $500 certificate, or a $1,000 certificate, and if there be, as I understand there are, notes even higher than that, he may give certificates of such higher denominations, but he can not issue a certificate for $75 for $1,100 or for any other sum except a sum of the denomination of the United States notes.

What did this man do when he presented this money to the assistant treasurer at New Orleans? He did not demand a certificate of that sort, and if the assistant treasurer had given a certificate for any other sum than the sum mentioned in the statute he would have acted in violation of law. Let us see what else:

Corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin deposited for or representing the certificates shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand.

For the payment of the certificates then and there issued. The Senator from Colorado would say that this would be a technical compliance with the law, an adherence to the letter of the law but a violation of its spirit. In the first place, in answer to that argument, I have to say that when the letter of the law is plain, when the meaning of a statute is clear, you have no right to speculate about what its spirit is. Of all the dangerous heresies that have ever afflicted mankind in judicial and governmental affairs there is none more so than that a public official shall undertake to say that "while the plain letter of the law prescribes my duty thus and so, I will dive down a little deeper than that; I will disregard the plain language of the statute, and I will divine for myself what the spirit of it is, and I will go by that."

Now, sir, that is the essence of tyranny and the essence of anarchy. We have a plain rule upon that subject which is recognized by all lawyers and by all courts, that where the language of the statute is plain and unambiguous, as it is here, you must stick to the letter, because the letter is the law, and you can not speculate as to what the legislature may have intended to say when they did not say it. The duty is to ascertain what the legislature said, and not the motive and spirit which the legislator had in his bosom which he did not disclose but which some man thinks exists and constitutes the spirit of the statute. The spirit of the statute is nothing more nor less than what he who undertakes to state what it is wishes that the legislature had said and which the legislature wished not to say.

There is a great deal more in this refusal of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans to receive this money upon this illegal receipt than has been suggested. Let us see what was the object of Congress in passing the law. What did it prescribe? You, the holder, carry your money to the assistant treasurer, count it, get your silver certificates, exchange the two, and when that operation is performed what is the legal result? It is this: the silver belongs to the Government and the certificate belongs to the depositor. There is an exchange. If, the moment after that transaction has been completed, the Government is robbed of the silver it is the Government's loss. If the holder of the silver certificates is robbed it is his loss. That is the scheme and that is the transaction which the statute authorizes to be consummated between the holder of the certificate and the Treasurer of the United States.

But what was the transaction which the express company, the banks in Mississippi and Texas, and Mr. Roach, the cashier of the bank in New Orleans, desired the assistant treasurer to make? Let us see what would be the legal result of that transaction if it had been consummated. Here comes the agent of the express company. He says, "I have got here in these boxes $25,000 in silver. I want your receipt for it, 'subject to count,' on account of the National Bank," or some other bank of New Orleans. Suppose the assistant treasurer had done what he asked him to do and what he is denounced here for not doing, let us see what sort of a transaction that would have been in law.

In the first place, who would have owned the money after it was deposited and before it was counted? Would it have belonged to the depositor or to the bank or to the treasurer? It is very clear that it would not have belonged to the treasurer, because it was an inchoate transaction, not completed till the final count. That is undoubted law. There was something else to be done to pass the title to it; it was to be counted.

Here the United States Treasurer becomes by an illegal act the depositary of private funds. Where is the law for that? Where is the statute which authorizes the Treasurer of the United States to become the bailee of money belonging to private individuals? There is none.

I will go on a little further and look at this transaction in its other legal aspects. The treasurer gives a receipt and the receipt is handed to the bank. What control has the treasurer over that receipt? Suppose he counts the money the next day and finds it is all there just as he receipted for it, who does the money belong to then? It is still the money of the depositor, because he has got nothing for it except the private, the illegal, and unauthorized receipt given by the assistant treasurer. He has got that receipt and nothing more. Suppose the depositing bank does not return it. Suppose the bank says, "We have got our money now in the subtreasury of the United States at New Orleans; there is plenty of room there for it, and it is safe there; and as Mr. Roach says in the letters here somewhere, "our vaults are overflowing with silver dollars and we have got no room for it, and we have succeeded in getting this $25,000 of silver money into the vaults of the United States Treasury and have got their receipt for it, and we do not want the certificates," and so we will not return the receipt nor demand the certificates of silver.

Mr. BECK. I will state what would be a test, if the Senator will allow me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. As was suggested before, this would be a test. If the receipt given to him for that money would not have been received the next day at the custom-house in payment for dutiable goods, then it is not the receipt the law contemplated.

Mr. GEORGE. I was just going to show what this receipt was and how different it was from the things which the law authorizes to be put out. By the kindness of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] (because I rarely have anything of that sort) I have managed to get a ten-dollar silver certificate. I find, in the first place, that it is a promise on the part of the United States to pay $10 to bearer. It is not a receipt. It is an obligation of the United States to pay to bearer $10; and whoever gets that, whether by theft or fraud, by well-known rules of commercial law if he presents it to the Treasurer of the United States he may get the money upon it and the Government is acquitted. It is money, or rather it is currency. It circulates as currency.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to another fact in relation to this matter.

The object of the law of 1878 was to increase the currency of the country, to make silver dollars currency, to put them in circulation among the people; and the object of the third section of the law now under consideration was, whenever you took the silver dollars out of the currency and put them in the Treasury you must put an equivalent amount of silver certificates into the currency so there would be no diminution of the currency of the country—none of this contraction of which my friend from Texas as well as myself have such a great horror.

Now, we will test this arrangement which they tried to make with the Treasurer of the United States at New Orleans by these rules and see how it squares with the statute. Recollect that the plain provision of the statute is that whenever so many silver dollars are taken out of circulation and put into the vaults of the United States Treasury the same amount exactly of silver certificates shall be put into circulation, so that there would be neither increase nor diminution of the circulation by the transaction.

Let us see how that would stand with reference to the receipt which Senators are denouncing the Secretary of the Treasury for not giving. He gives a certificate or receipt which reads in about this way: "Received of the Southern Express Company a package said to contain $25,000, subject to count." You put that into the hands of the depositor, and what is that? It is simply nothing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GEORGE. Of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is in error in supposing that any certificate is issued from the Treasury or from a subtreasury upon the receipt of silver coin except the silver certificate. The ordinary course the Senator will see. If a man should deposit in the subtreasury $25,000 of silver coin a certificate might be issued by the receiving teller, which would be signed by the assistant treasurer, in the nature of a direction to the paying teller to pay out $25,000 of silver certificates; but there is no certificate given to the depositor which can circulate as money.

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose that is subject to count, how could he give his order to the other person to pay $25,000 until he counted it?

Mr. SHERMAN. The subtreasurer simply certifies that A. B. has deposited in the Treasury $25,000.

Mr. GEORGE. Subject to count. That is the way it is here.

Mr. SHERMAN. That certificate is not given to the depositor at all; it is given to the paying teller as his authority to pay out $25,000 of silver certificates.

Mr. GEORGE. That is where the transaction is legitimate, as I insist it ought to be. It is only an order given by one man who receives the money to another man who pays the money.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all there is of it.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all right in a regular and legal transaction. It is nothing but a check from one officer on another, which settles the transaction. One man counts in the silver dollars and another man pays out the silver certificates; there are two men doing it; but when we consider them as officials of the United States, when we consider it as the act of the Government, it is but the single act of the treasurer. It is true two men do it, but it is the single act of the treasury, and therefore you may consider it a simultaneous action. But that is not the thing which Mr. Roach wanted done. Let us see what his complaint is on that subject. In his letter of January 2 he says:

STATE NATIONAL BANK, New Orleans, January 2, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Quite a number of our correspondents in Texas, Mississippi, Tennessee, &c., desire to arrange some method by which they may deposit with the subtreasury at New Orleans standard dollars for redemption, the proceeds, in silver certificates, to be paid over to us, after count, for their credit.

That was the arrangement he desired to make. Then he proceeds:

This method of redemption has heretofore been customary, and thinking it was a matter of course, several banks during the present week have shipped silver dollars to the treasury for redemption in this manner. But the assistant treasurer has refused to receive it, assigning two grounds, first that it would make the treasury the intermediary between banks, and second that he is not prepared to handle promptly the large amount of silver which would probably come in on him for redemption under this method.

Now I want to call the attention of the Senate especially to his further remark. He says:

To his first reason—

That is about making the subtreasury an intermediary—

To his first reason I confess I do not see much force, for if the country banks have the privilege of depositing silver and taking in lieu silver certificates it seems less trouble for him to issue his receipt—

Not silver certificates—but his receipt—for silver "subject to count."

Now I say that is a transaction which the law does not authorize. It not only does not authorize it, but it is in express violation of what the law requires to be done. The law says that when the holder shall bring the silver dollars to the treasury the treasurer shall give not his receipt, "subject to count," but give silver certificates of certain denominations. That is the legal and proper way to make this transaction.

This is not what Mr. Roach and the banks wanted done. They demanded that something else should be done—that the subtreasurer should give his receipt for $25,000, "subject to count." The money, the dollars, whether twenty-five thousand or more or less, are demanded to be placed in the subtreasury of the United States, though they do not belong to the United States. They belong to the holder.

Now, what is the legal effect of this receipt that is to go out? As suggested by my learned friend from Kentucky, it can not be received in dues to the Government; it can not pay duties. Let us see, now, how a man would undertake to pay duties with this receipt, even if the officer receiving duties was willing to violate the law to receive it. Suppose he owed the Government $25,000 for duties. The holder brings his receipt and offers it. It is not the $25,000 due, nor the representative of it; it is not even prima facie evidence that $25,000 has been deposited. The $25,000 mentioned in such a receipt means nothing, because it is "subject to count." It would have the same legal force and value precisely if it had said: "Received from the express company a package said to contain silver, which, when we count, we will account for." It is not even presumptive evidence that $25,000 has been deposited. I submit to my friend from Texas this case: Suppose a transaction between two private parties and one had given his receipt for $25,000 "subject to count," and he did not pay it, and the holder of the receipt was to bring his action at law to recover on that receipt, could he read that receipt to the jury and to the court and ask for a judgment for $25,000? Most certainly he could not, because there is no assertion in it that $25,000 has been received; it is only a statement that there may be $25,000 if it turns out so on the count. So when such a receipt by the assistant treasurer gets out it is nothing. The certificates authorized by law to be issued are currency; this illegal receipt is nothing; it is not negotiable; it can not be legally passed from one to another; if the receipt was stolen from the depositing bank the day it was received the bank would lose nothing; it would still have the same claim for the $25,000 or whatever the sum might be found to be by the count that he had before the receipt was stolen. It is not a negotiable paper at all, and for that very reason it would be to the interest of the bank having a paper of that sort with the silver dollars in the United States Treasury not to present it until it needed the dollars, there being absolute security for the dollars while in the United States Treasury. The bank has made the United States Treasurer the guarantor of its $25,000 against fire and against thieves. I say that is a transaction which the statute of the United States does not authorize, and I say in addition to that that if a custom grew up by which such a dealing could be had it was a custom which it was the duty of a Democratic administration as soon as it got into power to break down, a custom "more honored in the breach than in the observance," because it was a custom not authorized by law but in violation of law.

Now with this explanation of the transaction it is plain that there is no occasion for all this denouncing of the Secretary of the Treasury. I am not going to advocate the peculiar views the Secretary of the Treasury has upon silver, because I do not agree with him. I believe that silver is a proper constitutional coin; I believe that silver certificates for one, two, five, and ten dollars, and whatever other denomination we may adopt, is the very best method by which silver can circulate among the people with the most practical convenience to them, and I am ready here, as I was two years ago, to vote for a proposition by which they shall have these silver certificates in these small sums, so that silver through these representatives may circulate freely wherever they are wanted.

As to the other charges which have been made against the Secretary of the Treasury I will say but little. I believe there was some charge that he would not exchange silver certificates for gold. I am not going into that now to any great extent, because that is not involved in this issue. If a Senator complains that the Secretary of the Treasury has violated any duty imposed upon him by refusing to exchange silver certificates for gold coin it is but right that he should have the same privilege in reference to that complaint that he has had in reference to the complaints in the resolutions of the Senator from Louisiana, let him have an opportunity to give his reasons. But, Mr. President, it was a little singular that the refusal of the Secretary to give silver certificates for gold should be made the subject of denunciation here when upon my inquiry if there was any law authorizing or requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates for silver on the deposit of gold it is found there is no such law.

Let us examine into the matter of giving silver certificates for gold a little further. Suppose my friend from Texas should go with a hundred dollars in gold to the Treasury of the United States and that he should tender it, saying, "I want to deposit this gold and I want a silver certificate." The gold is placed in the Treasury and the silver certificate is issued. I say that is a transaction which the face of the paper does not represent. In other words, I say that it is a transaction in violation of the only writing that has occurred between the parties.

My friend from Texas tenders his hundred dollars or his $10 to the Treasurer and gets a silver certificate, and what does the silver certificate say? It contains an assertion on the part of the Government of some fact. Does this certificate say that $10 in gold has been deposited with the Treasurer, and that the Treasurer will redeem it by paying $10 in silver? No, sir.

Mr. COKE. I will say to the Senator that in the latest report the Secretary of the Treasury says there were $38,000,000 of silver certificates in the Treasury.

Mr. GEORGE. I was going on to say that the thing that would be done would be in violation of the only written record made of it. That record is contained in the silver certificate, and certifies that ten silver dollars have been deposited. But no silver was deposited.

But all this complaint is a little strange any way. I hear the Senator from Colorado, who is the great par excellence friend of silver, every time he speaks commending the silver dollar as equal in all respects to gold. I hear my friend from Texas doing the same thing. Under the law of the United States they say that a silver dollar of 412½ grains is equal to a gold dollar; that they are interchangeable, each being the exact equal of the other. If that is so, what blame can be attached to the Treasurer of the United States for not swapping a silver certificate for a gold dollar, when he makes nothing for the Government by the transaction? Who has a right to complain of his refusal? If the Treasurer does something he is not required by law to do there ought to be some benefit accruing to the Government of the United States from the transaction. According to my friend from Texas and my friend from Colorado the gold dollar is worth neither more nor less than the silver dollar, neither more nor less than the silver certificate; and yet the Treasurer is denounced for not doing the foolish and at the same time unauthorized thing of swapping a thing for another, both being exactly equal—one black-eyed pea for another, both being exactly alike and of exactly the same value.

My friend from Texas is a Democratic Senator, and denounces the Secretary of the Treasury. I am not criticising his course, because I have no doubt he is inspired with the loftiest motives of patriotism and of duty to his people in the course he pursues. I have known him long enough to be willing to state that about all his actions here; but I also have a right to speak as a Democratic Senator, representing in part not so great a State, it is true, as my friend does, not so great in population, not so great in resources, but as true and as devoted to the Constitution and to the interests of this country as Texas. The people of Mississippi are as good, and as patriotic, and as Democratic as the people of Texas. And so representing them, when I differ as I do from the administration on its silver policy (and I shall take occasion before this Congress adjourns to develop my views on silver more fully), I feel it to be my duty as well as my pleasure when I see the administration or any of its members wrongfully charged with violation of law to make that defense for them which the law of the land gives them. In this instance there has been no violation of law, but a strict observance of it.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I had no idea that the resolution which I offered would have led to such an extended debate. The resolution sought to accomplish two objects. The first was that the Senate should inquire whether the same facilities were afforded by the subtreasury at New Orleans as were afforded by other subtreasuries; and the second was whether there was an adequate clerical force to discharge the duties of that office. I sent a dispatch this morning to Mr. Roach, the cashier of the bank at New Orleans, to inform me whether the banks of Texas and Tennessee had shipped that silver to the subtreasury for the purpose of obtaining therefor silver certificates, and also to explain the method of transacting that business with reference to shipments of coin to the subtreasury at New Orleans and the bank agency at New Orleans. I merely rise now for the purpose of reading his answer. It confirms the view that I expressed day before yesterday that these banks were not intending, as the subtreasurer believed or represented, to use the subtreasury as an intermediary between banks, and the whole transaction was simply this: that the shipper from the interior shipped silver dollars directly to the subtreasury with instructions that the subtreasury should deliver to the correspondent in New Orleans the silver certificates; and that was all. Therefore I ask leave to read the answer to my dispatch.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., February 10, 1886.

Hon. J. B. EUSTIS, United States Senate:

Shippers sought to get rid of excessive silver by shipping to subtreasurer, asking that silver certificates therefor be turned over to their New Orleans correspondents.

That was the whole of it. It was a mere case of agency. That seems to have been a practice, whether in violation of law or not I do not know; but I understand that it had been the custom, and that there is no responsibility in such a transaction; that the principal in the interior ships silver dollars directly to the subtreasury at New Orleans, and directs that instead of the silver certificates being sent to him in the interior they be delivered to his correspondent in New Orleans; and if the shipper chooses to take that risk and do that mode of business, he has a right to do it. He adds:

Subtreasurer declined to receive from express because, firstly, he doubted propriety of Treasury becoming intermediate between country and city banks; secondly, for lack of clerical force. I feel assured provision of sufficient clerks would remedy everything.

T. R. ROACH, Cashier.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, when I was addressing the Senate a while ago——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would the Senator from Texas yield to a motion for an executive session?

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me just two or three minutes; I am not going to occupy the floor long. When I was addressing the Senate a while ago I referred to the letter of Mr. Roach, and now desire to call attention to it again, for the purpose of showing that people who reside in New Orleans experience the same treatment complained of by the Texas and Tennessee banks. He says this:

This year, however, the subtreasury at this point declines to receive silver from the country banks, though the latter write me that this facility is still accorded them by other subtreasuries. In this the Treasurer of the United States sustains our assistant treasurer; and I, therefore, presume he is right as a matter of law. But the subtreasurer virtually refuses to receive it from depositors in this city also; that is to say, he so limits the amount and receives it so seldom that it is practically a refusal.

That is the proposition I set out to establish and which I think is clearly established by this correspondence. The Senator from Mississippi has made an exceedingly able and ingenious speech here in defense of this officer. He may technically be right, but that the spirit and essence and substance of the law of 1878 for the issuance of silver certificates has been defeated and nullified in the city of New Orleans there is no sort of question if we can believe the testimony of this gentleman, a prominent business man in New Orleans, who is indorsed by the Senator from Louisiana as a good and thoroughly reliable business man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask my friend from Texas, with his permission, why this administration does not turn this Republican rascal out and put in a Democrat who understands his duties under the law? [Laughter.]

Mr. COKE. Is he a Republican?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know. I assume if he is so bad as that, he must be.

Mr. COKE. It makes no difference with me whether he is a Republican or a Democrat.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask who this officer is and how long he has been in office?

Mr. COKE. I do not know anything about the politics of the officer. I know that this law is being violated if the testimony of Mr. Roach is to be believed; I know that the people of my State are suffering from it; I know that the silver currency is sought to be discounted on account of it, and I believe it to be a crime against the country and its prosperity and its people for any officer to depreciate its currency by a refusal to carry out a law which he has been sworn to execute and has been placed in office to execute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Texas tell me if he knows who this officer is and how long he has been in office?

Mr. COKE. I simply know the name of the officer from the correspondence before the Senate. I do not know how long he has been in office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend from Louisiana or both my friends whom I see on my left whether this is one of the old officers or some new man who is inexperienced in affairs or what he is?

Mr. GIBSON. He is a gentleman appointed by this administration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a very bad state of things. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The letter which has just been read was not among those which are included in the official report.

Mr. COKE. It is a letter that the Senator from Louisiana sent to the Clerk's desk two days ago from Mr. Roach.

Mr. GEORGE. Directed by Mr. Roach to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. It has never been before the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. COKE. Not that I know of.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say in justice to that officer that an ex parte statement of that sort ought not to be considered as against the Secretary of the Treasury. He ought to have the privilege of saying what his side is.

Mr. COKE. He will have that privilege when the committee investigate this subject. I believe this man Roach. I think he has told the truth.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi says there has been no violation of law. I produce the testimony of a reputable gentleman from New Orleans that there has been, and I state further that under former administrations of the subtreasury at New Orleans the people throughout the South received silver certificates whenever they presented their silver dollars. I am not informed that there are fewer clerks now there than there were then. I presume there is the same number of clerks there now that there was then. If the Treasurer of the United States or the subtreasurer have ever asked in any report made to Congress for an increase of their clerical force, their reports fail to show it so far as I have been able to examine. To say that he has not sufficient clerical force when his predecessors did have it seems to me to leave this gentleman in the attitude of having been deficient in some vital respects in the administration of his office, for there is no question about the fact that the people have failed to get an execution of the law of 1878, and are suffering a depreciation of their principal currency from that fact not only in Texas and in other States adjacent to New Orleans, but, as this gentleman says, in the city of New Orleans. I will read again what he says:

But the subtreasurer virtually refuses to receive it—from depositors in this city also; that is to say, he so limits the amount and receives it so seldom that it is practically a refusal.

Here is a refusal by the officer to obey the law to the detriment and injury of the people. That is the proposition. All these fine-spun arguments of the Senator from Mississippi, in which he may be technically correct, avail nothing when met by this fact, and I hope the committee will take charge of this resolution and give it a thorough investigation. The idea that for the want of one or two clerks the whole monetary system of the country is to be thrown into confusion and half of its money depreciated is too poor and flimsy a pretext to be set up here in defense of the conduct of the subtreasurer at New Orleans. Nobody can be deceived by it. It is a pretext and nothing else. It is in line with all the other conduct of the Treasurer in respect to silver. His explanation is a lame and impotent one, and it ought to be inquired into.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. I stated to-day that I had been informed by the Treasurer of the United States that $25,000 had been lost at New Orleans in consequence of the former practice of receiving money not counted and giving a receipt subject to count. I have just received this telegram from the Treasurer, which I desire to read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 10, 1886.

Hon. W. CALL, Senate:

The receipts amounting to $15,000 were held in the cash-drawer as money, the teller representing that the banks had been paid, which was not the case.

C. N. JORDAN.

By virtue of that practice $15,000 was found to be deficient.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. DOLPH, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. 41) for the relief of James S. Clark & Co. be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 10, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, as follows:

Almighty God, the nation to-day stands as mourner beside the bier of an excellent upright citizen, a great captain, a man of stainless name and record. We humbly beseech Thee to uphold and console the bereaved wife in her unspeakable affliction; to care for and befriend the orphaned grandchildren, and fulfill Thine ancient word, to be the husband of the widow and the father of the fatherless.

Impress upon us all the solemn lesson of these sudden departures; and may our hearts be set to obey Thy commandments, and pass our time in rest and quietness, with the assurance that they who live a life of duty, fearing God and loving the neighbor, shall have an immortality of peace and blessedness at Thy right hand. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceeding was read and approved.

TARIFF ACT OF 1883.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information upon questions arising under the tariff act of 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HOSPITAL STEWARDS, DEPARTMENT OF THE EAST.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting correspondence in regard to quartering hospital stewards in the Department of the East, and asking an appropriation of $58,765 for construction of quarters; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ESTIMATES, BUREAU OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior for salaries and expenses in the Bureau of Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER, in accordance with the rule, laid before the House Senate bills and a joint resolution; which were read a first and second time, and severally referred as follows:

A bill (S. 753) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon—to the Committee on Military Affairs;

A bill (S. 1120) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Omaha National Bank of Omaha, Nebr.—to the Committee on Banking and Currency;

A bill (S. 1394) to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey said property—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and

Joint resolution (S. R. 10) to amend the statute in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes, approved June 10, 1880, so that the provisions of the same shall be extended to the port of Key West, Fla., and the provisions of the seventh section of the statute be extended to the port of Tampa, Fla.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PETTIBONE, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family; and to Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, until the 20th instant; to Mr. BURLEIGH, for one week; to Mr. CAMPBELL, for three days, and to Mr. FORAN, for four days, all on account of important business.

DEATH OF GENERAL HANCOCK.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read and presently considered.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has learned with profound sorrow of the great and irreparable loss which the country has sustained in the death of that great and good man Maj. Gen. Winfield S. Hancock.

Resolved, That this House, in common with all his countrymen, mourn the death of him who was the stainless soldier for the Union in war, and the undaunted defender of the Constitution and of civil liberty in peace, and at all times the stainless man and the incorruptible patriot.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect and affection for the exalted virtues of this hero and patriot this House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be directed to transmit to the widow of the honored dead a copy of these resolutions and the assurance of the heartfelt sympathy of the House in the sorrowful bereavement which is alike hers and the nation's.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolutions?

There was no objection.

The resolutions were agreed to; and in accordance therewith (at 12 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 11, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a memorial of Local Assembly No. 3529, Knights of Labor, of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of certain bills as to pilots and pilotage. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. Does the memorial indicate which pilotage bill it opposes?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It indicates "the bill introduced by Senator FRYE."

Mr. FRYE. I introduced three. I wish such memorialists would inform me which one they oppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The number of the bill is not given in the memorial.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of Excelsior Local Assembly No. 2219, Knights of Labor, of Des Moines, Iowa, praying for the organization of a Territorial form of government over the Indian Territory and for the opening of all public and unoccupied lands in that Territory to settlement under the homestead laws; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition numerously signed by members of E. D. Baker Post, No. 40, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, of Baldwin City, Kans., praying such legislation as will embody the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I also present a paper headed "Oklahoma petition," addressed to me as an individual member of the Senate, signed by the officers of Local Assembly No. 1800, Knights of Labor, at Topeka, Kans., praying for legislation concerning the Indian Territory and Indian reservations. I observe that many of these papers have been treated as petitions and referred to the appropriate committee. They seem to be forms of a printed petition, which has been sent out, I assume, from some central organization, and are forwarded here in response to that suggestion. How far they may represent the views of the organizations by whom they are signed I have no means of knowing. I have sent many of these directly to the Committee on Indian Affairs, not knowing that they could be treated as petitions; but inasmuch as other Senators have presented them to the Senate, I ask that this petition may be received and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be received and so referred.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of F. A. Noeller, late a private in Company K, One hundredth Regiment New York Volunteers, praying to have the charge of desertion removed from his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of ladies of Rockford, Ill., praying the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution forbidding disfranchisement of women on account of sex; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Monmouth, Ill., and a petition of Knights of Labor of Galesburg, Ill., praying that all public and unoccupied lands in the Indian Territory be opened to homestead settlement, and that a Territorial government be established therein; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLACKBURN presented the petition of McKnight & Richardson, who were engaged in business in El Paso, Tex., in 1861, praying to be remunerated for certain losses incurred by them in connection with furnishing supplies to the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAWYER presented the petition of Mr. Beach and other officers of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Madison, Wis., praying for the adoption of a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring the elective franchise on all citizens without regard to sex; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the Galesburg Local Assembly of the Knight of Labor, of Illinois, praying for the opening to settlement of all public and unoccupied lands in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Chicago Typographical Union, remonstrating against the passage of the international copyright bill; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition adopted by the New York quarterly meeting of the Society of Friends, held in New York city on the 27th of January, 1886, praying for the passage of the scientific temperance instruction bill for all schools under control of the Federal Government, to wit, in the District of Columbia, Territories, Military and Naval Academies, Indian and colored schools; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. INGALLS presented a memorial of citizens of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 485) to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company, of Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 1013) providing for the establishment of a port of entry at Mount Desert Ferry, in the town of Hancock, in the State of Maine; and

A bill (S. 1397) to establish a port of delivery at Springfield, in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 147) to reimburse George S. Fisher for losses sustained by fire in Japan, November 26, 1866, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 715) to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation, situate in the State of Nebraska, of the Winnebago tribe of Indians, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1433) for the relief of the Miami Indians of Kansas.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 220) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union agency, Indian Territory, for services and expenses, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CONVICT LABOR AT PEORIA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a Senate resolution, papers relating to the employment of convict labor on a public building in Peoria, Ill. The letter was referred with a desire on the part of a standing committee of the Senate to have it printed. The cost of printing the usual number will be $44. The committee instruct me to report in favor of printing the usual number.

The report was agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. MANDERSON. There was referred to the Committee on Printing a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in response to a Senate resolution, a letter of the Secretary of the Interior and copies of the reports of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. Two resolutions were referred to the committee—one to print the usual number of the reports and the other to print, in addition to the usual number, 3,000 copies for the use of Congress, for distribution by the two Houses. The committee report that the cost of printing the usual number of these reports will be $702.25, and that 3,000 additional copies will cost $826. The committee, deeming it a matter of very great importance that the reports should be placed before Congress in a convenient form in view of matters pertaining to the road which are likely to come before Congress at this session, report in favor of printing the usual number and 3,000 additional copies. I ask for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in addition to the usual number there be printed of the letter of the President of the 4th instant, communicating to the Senate copies of the reports of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, together with said reports, 3,000 copies, 1,000 for the use of the Senate and 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1459) granting an increase of pension to Walter A. Donaldson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1460) for the erection of a public building at Akron, Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1461) granting a pension to John W. Reynolds; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1462) for the relief of the widow of the late Lieut. Col. Joseph A. Haskin, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 1463) granting arrears of pension to Mary Helena Mahan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1464) for the relief of Michael Carter, jr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1465) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Grand Island, in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1466) granting an increase of pension to Stephen R. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1467) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1468) for the relief of David Morrow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1469) for the relief of Mrs. S. B. Duvall, widow of the late Rev. W. P. Duvall, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1470) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Richard T. Greene; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1471) to remove the charge of desertion from the rolls and records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army against certain soldiers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHACE introduced a bill (S. 1472) for the relief of Peter K. Dederick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1473) for the relief of Susan E. Alger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 1474) for the extension and repair of the public building at Belfast, Me.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1475) granting a pension to Isabel George; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 1476) to amend the act of Congress approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 1477) for the relief of Nathaniel McKay and the executors of Donald McKay; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1478) to authorize the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas A. Hendricks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAWES (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1479) for the relief of the Atlantic Works; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1480) for the relief of John J. Curtis and the executors of Edward S. Tilden; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1481) granting an increase of pension to Col. Charles E. Copehart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JACKSON introduced a bill (S. 1482) for the relief of James A. Galbraith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1483) abrogating all treaties heretofore made and now operative between the United States Government and the Chinese Empire, in so far as they, or any of them, provide for, recognize, or permit the coming of Chinese to the United States; and in so far as they, or any of them, inhibit the United States from absolutely prohibiting the coming of Chinese to the United States, and repealing all acts of Congress in so far as they, or any of them, recognize or permit the coming of Chinese to the United States, and absolutely prohibiting the coming of Chinese to the United States, excepting only diplomatic, consular, and other officers, and prohibiting the landing of any Chinese therein, excepting only such diplomatic and other officers; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I move that the bill lie on the table to be called up hereafter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 39) to authorize the printing of the proceedings in Congress in accepting the statue of the late James A. Garfield, President of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A special and important committee of the Senate, I understand, is obliged to go this afternoon to New York to make some investigations there and other committees of the Senate are very much occupied with important measures. In view of that fact, though I should be very glad for one to get on with the public business that is on the Calendar, I think we shall do more good to the country by working in committee to-morrow than in the Senate. Accordingly, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is impossible to hear a word that the Senator says.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was stating that in view of the fact that an important committee of the Senate has to go to New York this afternoon to make investigations there under an order of the Senate and other committees have important business that ought to be sooner or later before us, I thought that the public service, notwithstanding we ought to get on with the Calendar, would be better promoted by adjourning over from to-day rather than from to-morrow, and accordingly I moved than when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

SILVER DEPOSITS AT SUBTREASURIES.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the resolution submitted by Mr. EUSTIS on the 6th instant, which was to add to the resolution:

The committee also inquire of and concerning the alleged defalcation in the subtreasury at New Orleans mentioned in the telegram from C. N. Jordan, Treasurer, addressed to Senator CALL, and presented by him to the Senate on the 9th instant, and whether such defalcation was in any wise connected with the exchange of silver dollars for silver certificates.

The amendment was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 126) to change the name of the National Bank of Winona;

A bill (S. 241) for the relief of Joseph W. Parish; and

A bill (S. 382) to authorize the Merchants' National Bank of Little Rock, Ark., to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, it was Ordered, That the papers on file in the case of the bill for the relief of Francis H. Plummer may be withdrawn from the files for use before the Committee on War Claims of the House, there having been no adverse report.

COL. GEORGE W. GETTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is now in order under Rule VIII, and the first bill on the Calendar will be announced.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 225) to authorize Col. George W. Getty, United States Army, retired, to be placed upon the retired-list of the Army with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to that bill; and if it is to be considered now I desire to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. SEWELL. I did not understand the remark of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state what I meant by my objection. There was an agreement made a few days ago in regard to the bill. At that time I did not have the papers present which I have now, and it was understood that the bill should not lose its place on the Calendar. I am perfectly willing that it shall retain its place on the Calendar, and I am ready to discuss it this morning.

Mr. FRYE. Under the five-minute rule?

Mr. LOGAN. I should rather not proceed under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill comes up under the eighth rule, which limits the debate to five minutes. When a Senator objects the bill goes over for general debate, to be called up at some other time.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I desire to discuss it. I can not do so in five minutes, however.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill was reported by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] from the Committee on Claims. He is not present this morning, and he asked me that it might be postponed when it was next reached until he came in, as it would be the subject of some debate. I ask that the bill be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

The bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. PLUMB. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

W. H. POWELL.

The bill (S. 269) for the relief of W. H. Powell was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 4, after the name "W. H. Powell," to insert "surviving partner of the firm of W. H. Powell & Co.," and in line 13, after the word "Ohio," to insert "and in full satisfaction of all claims of the said W. H. Powell & Co., and of said W. H. Powell against the Government of the United States, in any manner arising out of the said assessment and the seizure and sale or loss of said property;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay to W. H. Powell, surviving partner of the firm of W. H. Powell & Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $498.54, which shall be in full compensation for damage sustained by reason of an erroneous assessment, and seizure therefor, on or about the 1st day of March, 1871, of a certain distillery bonded warehouse numbered 16, with cattle-pens, machinery, and fixtures, then owned by the firm of W. H. Powell & Co., of the third collection district of Ohio, and in full satisfaction of all claims of the said W. H. Powell & Co., and of said W. H. Powell, against the Government of the United States, in any manner arising out of the said assessment, and the seizure and sale or loss of said property; and to release the judgment now standing against said W. H. Powell & Co., and John Mills and others, of Dayton, Ohio, as their sureties.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SPOONER January 14, 1886:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred bill S. 269, submit the following report:

The claimant is the surviving partner of the firm of W. H. Powell & Co., which was engaged in business as distillers at Chambersburg, in the third collection district of Ohio, from some time in November, 1868, to the 26th day of January, 1869. During this period the monthly assessments upon their business were regularly made by one O. C. Maxwell, the United States assessor for that district, and the same were promptly paid by the firm, the amount paid by them aggregating $934.23, which were receipted for in full by D. W. Schaeffer, United States collector for that district.

Subsequent examinations, by the proper officers of the Internal Revenue Department, developed the fact that the sum of $834.33, so paid by said firm during the period mentioned, was $65.76 in excess of the amount justly assessable upon their property.

The business of the firm was discontinued on the 26th day of January, 1869, because of scarcity of water, and the inferior quality of grain then obtainable. The water supply was variable, being inadequate for the regular operation of the distillery, even at its minimum producing capacity, and necessitating reductions and increase from time to time in their capacity, and even temporary suspensions of the business.

Due notice was given by the firm of the commencement of business, and the reduction and increase of capacity from time to time, and of the suspensions and final discontinuance of business, and upon due applications to the proper revenue officers the permits required by law in the premises were obtained by the firm. The assistant assessor, however, in making returns to his superior officer of the temporary suspensions, omitted to state, in some of his certificates, what the papers showed to have been in fact true, that there were at those times no mash, wort, or beer in the distillery, or on the premises.

Upon each notice of suspension or resumption of business, the proper locks, seals, and fastenings were placed upon and removed from the doors, tubs, &c., by the proper officers.

After the discontinuance of the business Mr. Maxwell retired from the office of United States assessor, and was succeeded by George G. Johnson, who, because of technical defects and omissions in the certificates of the assistant assessor before mentioned, made a reassessment on form 89 for the month of January, 1869, upon the maximum capacity of the distillery.

Mr. Maxwell, who was assessor during the entire period in which Powell & Co. were in business, says in an affidavit on file in the Department:

"It was my duty to make the assessment, and it was made with full knowledge of the facts. It was reported to and confirmed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the parties on my recommendation settled the same in full and quit the business of distilling. I am of the opinion, and then was, that they were assessed the full amount authorized by law, and believe that any reassessment, such as is made in form 89, is erroneous, and consequently illegal."

The reassessment thus wrongfully made amounted to $1,491.87, which Powell & Co. declined to pay, and the property was seized by the Government and sold for $226.50, which was the sum required to cover the expenses of seizure and sale. The Government bid it in and subsequently sold it for the same amount.

Suit was also brought on the distiller's bond, and judgment obtained after the death of McDowell, the junior partner of Powell & Co., for $1,586.56, which covered the reassessment, penalty, and interest. Powell, the surviving partner, paid $206.28 on the judgment in 1874, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue ordered that it be no further enforced.

The United States district attorney, Mr. Bateman, who had charge of the suit upon the bond, states in a letter before the committee that the defendants offered to show the facts as to the erroneous reassessment, but the court ruled out the evidence, holding under the law the reassessment to be conclusive in the suit upon the bond. The district attorney declares it to be his opinion that the reassessment was in fact illegal; and that if the parties had paid it they would have been entitled to recover back the money.

The seizure and the first and subsequent sale of the property by the Government were made while the claimant was absent from the State of Ohio, were without his knowledge, and he had therefore no opportunity to bid in the property or procure it to be done, or to appeal for relief to the proper officer of the Treasury Department.

The committee are of the opinion that the claimant is entitled to receive from the Government the sum of $498.54, the amount named in the bill, made up of the following items: For original overpayment, $65.76; the amount paid by Powell, as surviving partner, on the judgment rendered upon the bond, $206.28; and that the judgment in the action in the bond should be satisfied, and Powell & Co., and W. H. Powell, as survivor, and their and each of their sureties, relieved from further liability and obligation, of every kind, in the premises.

It is proper to mention the fact that the claim embracing the items last above mentioned was reported favorably by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses. It was also reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Claims in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, and the bill passed the Senate on the 2d day of June, 1884.

The committee recommend that the bill be amended by inserting after the word "Powell," in the fourth line, the words "surviving partner of the firm of W. H. Powell & Co.;" also, by inserting after the word "Ohio," where the same occurs in the twelfth line thereof, the words "and in full satisfaction of all claims of the said W. H. Powell & Co. against the Government of the United States, in any manner arising out of the said assessment, and the seizure and sale or loss of said property," and that as so amended the same do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT STRACHAN.

The bill (S. 574) for the relief of Robert Strachan was considered as in the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 12, after the word "having," to insert "been erected and," and in line 13, after the word "continued," to strike out the words "the same;" so as to make the section read:

That jurisdiction be, and the same is hereby, conferred upon the United States Court of Claims to hear, try, and determine, according to the rules and practice now in force in said court, any claim for damage which Robert Strachan may have against the District of Columbia by reason of the said District of Columbia, or its agents, servants, or employés, having changed the grade of New Hampshire avenue between Sixteenth and Seventeenth streets, and having turned the water upon the premises of the said Strachan and into his dwelling-house, and by means of an embankment having been erected and continued thereon for a long time, in said District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 2, after the word "rendered," to insert the words "for the claimant;" and at the end of the section to add, "and one-half of the amount of said judgment shall be charged against the revenues of the District of Columbia;" so as to make the section read:

That the judgment rendered in said action, if any shall be rendered for the claimant, shall be paid in the same manner as judgments are paid in said court as now provided by law; and one-half of the amount of said judgment shall be charged against the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE K. OTIS.

The bill (S. 699) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue to George K. Otis duplicates of certain land-warrants lost while in possession of officers of the Government was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the issue to George K. Otis of duplicates of three Porterfield land-warrants, issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved April 11, 1860, numbered 16, 17, and 120, respectively, upon satisfactory proof of ownership and loss of the same, and the execution of a bond, with good and sufficient sureties, in double the market value of the warrants so to be issued, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, conditioned to indemnify the United States against the presentation by an innocent holder of the alleged lost warrants.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. A. THOMAS.

The bill (S. 391) for the relief of A. A. Thomas was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "sum of," to insert:

Five hundred and forty dollars, as a reimbursement for money paid by A. A. Thomas for the use of the United States while register of the United States land office at Cawker City, Kans., and the further sum of;

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay to A. A. Thomas, or his assigns, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $540, as a reimbursement for money paid by A. A. Thomas for the use of the United States while register of the United States land office at Cawker City, Kans., and the further sum of $67.14, balance due said Thomas as compensation as such register for the quarters ending September 30, 1872, and March 31, 1875, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The bill (S. 150) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMSHIP CAROLINE MILLER.

The bill (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Commissioner of Navigation to cause the foreign-built steamship Caroline Miller, owned at the port of Baltimore, Md., by F. C. Miller, an American citizen, and rebuilt by him at Baltimore, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to add as a new section:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to authorize and direct the inspection of said steam-vessel, steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and the appurtenances of said boiler, and cause to be granted the proper and usual certificate issued to steam-vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that said steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests to be applied on the inspection of said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances will be the same, in all respects as to strength and safety, as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes, save that the fact that said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances not being constructed pursuant to the requirements of the laws of the United States, and are of unstamped iron, shall not be an obstacle to the granting of the usual certificate if said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances are found to be of sufficient strength and safety.

Mr. INGALLS. This appears to involve the consideration of an important principle. The contention has long been that ships built abroad were entitled to registry here; and if a registry is to be issued to this foreign-built ship, why not to all? I hope we shall have some explanation from the committee, as no report has been made in writing that will indicate why this differs in principle from the general contention that foreign-built ships should be entitled to registry in our country.

Mr. FRYE. This bill is in charge of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. I think it is important that just a word should be said in relation to it.

Under the general law, section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, it is provided:

The Secretary of the Treasury may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country, whenever such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States, and shall be purchased and repaired by a citizen of the United States, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel when so repaired.

In other words, Congress has given the Secretary of the Treasury the right to issue a register to a wrecked vessel, although a foreign vessel, provided it was wrecked within the shore-line, and provided the repairs made on that vessel in this country were equal to three-fourths of its value. The facts in the case now before the Senate are that it was wrecked just outside the shore-line—my recollection is, not half a mile outside the shore-line—and for that reason, when application was made to the Secretary of the Treasury, he held that under that section he had no jurisdiction. The additional fact is, that while about, I think, $200 was paid for the wreck, there was an expenditure made in the United States of several thousand dollars to put it into condition as a vessel. So, as to the three-fourths of the cost, it came within the section beyond any question. I am not able to state certainly, but I should say that, while $200 was paid for the wreck, $10,000 were expended on it in the United States after it was purchased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects to the further consideration of the bill under the eighth rule.

Mr. FRYE. Suppose the Senator from Kansas lets it stand until the Senator from Maryland comes in.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FRYE. Without losing its place on the Calendar.

H. A. MYERS.

The bill (S. 390) for the relief of H. A. Myers was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 10, after the word "to," to insert "July 7, 1864;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Paymaster-General of the United States Army be, and he is hereby, required to cause to be paid, out of any money appropriated, or which may hereafter be appropriated, for the payment of the Army of the United States, to H. A. Myers, late a private in the Eleventh Kansas Volunteers, a sum that shall be equal to the pay of a private soldier from the 17th day of September, 1862, to July 7, 1864, the date of his discharge from the service of the United States, deducting therefrom any amount that may have been paid to him as such private soldier and any amount that may be due from him to the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the report read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAWLEY January 19, 1886:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 390) for the relief of H. A. Myers, having had the same under consideration, adopt the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate of the Forty-sixth Congress, which is as follows:

Hiram A. Myers was enrolled and mustered in September 17, 1862, as private in Company D, Eleventh Kansas Cavalry, and served honorably to July 7, 1864. The muster-out roll of his company, dated September 13, 1865, says:

"This man enlisted in good faith, and served faithfully as a soldier from enlistment to July 7, 1864. His old enlistment papers were lost, new ones were made out, and upon examination he was rejected by T. Sinks, surgeon board of examiners of District N, Kansas, July 7, 1864, when he was dropped from the company rolls. There is due him for use and risk of horse and equipments from date of last payment to June 30, 1864, and he is indebted to the United States for horse equipments $31. He was last paid by Major Bowen to February 29, 1864."

The Adjutant-General says:

"There would appear to be no objection to this bill becoming a law."

The Secretary of War, in his letter to the committee touching this case, says:

"The legislation proposed by Senate bill 160 is approved by this Department."

Your committee, therefore, upon examining all the facts in the case, recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF GRADUATES OF MILITARY ACADEMY.

The bill (S. 223) to regulate the promotion of graduates of the United States Military Academy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that when any cadet of the United States Military Academy has gone through all its classes and received a regular diploma from the academic staff he shall be considered a candidate for a commission in the Army, in any arm or corps the duties of which he may have been judged competent to perform; and in case there shall not at the time be a vacancy in such arm or corps, he may be attached to it, at the discretion of the President, as an additional second lieutenant, with the usual pay and allowances of a second lieutenant, until a vacancy shall happen.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 5, after the word "staff," to strike out "he shall be considered a candidate for a commission in the Army" and insert "he may be promoted and commissioned as a second lieutenant."

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question. I understand that of the double purpose of this bill the main point is to be found in the last five lines; that is, to provide for an occurrence which is likely to take place in the shape of an excess of graduates at West Point beyond the number of vacancies existing in second lieutenancies in the Army at that time. The next graduating class, I understand, is to be unusually large, and it will furnish twenty-five cadets more than there are vacancies in the service.

I do not know that I have objection to that part of it, but I would ask the Senator from New Jersey what is the necessity of the part of the bill now under consideration. Why should we put in the provision that—he may be promoted and commissioned as a second lieutenant in any arm or corps of the Army in which there may be a vacancy and the duties of which he may have been judged competent to perform?

I understand that to be the law now.

Mr. SEWELL. A decision of the Second Comptroller practically legislates out of the service the cadet unless he receives an appointment and promotion. This is to provide for that. I read from the report of the Secretary of War:

A recent decision of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury sets aside a long usage as to the payment of graduates of the Military Academy who may be appointed to commissions in the Army. Heretofore the graduate received pay as a second lieutenant from the date of his graduation, but by the decision referred to he becomes entitled to pay only from the day on which he accepts his appointment and subscribes the oath of office.

Then it goes on to account for the time between graduation and joining his regiment. The practical result of the decision is that unless the cadet is appointed by the President to a lieutenantcy he is no more in the service.

Mr. PLUMB. Would he not always be appointed as a matter of course, except in the case provided for in the last part of this section; that is, where there are no vacancies? If that is so, I simply inquire what is the necessity for that part of the bill?

Mr. SEWELL. Under the act of 1882, a clause in an appropriation bill, the graduates in excess of vacancies existing in the Army were required to be discharged from the service. That excess has not occurred since then, and had not occurred previous to then for a number of years. The number of vacancies averaged about sixty-nine and a fraction a year, and the Government graduated from the academy about forty-nine and a fraction on the average. This is the first year in the history of the academy for several years where the graduating class will be more than the vacancies in the Army. There were reserved for the class on the 1st of January thirty-five vacancies; and in the ordinary course the vacancies will probably amount to fifty when the class graduates in June. The class is expected to graduate about seventy-eight, so that now for the first time in a series of years there will be twenty-eight more graduates than there are places in the Army for them. This bill is to provide that they shall be kept on the roll practically as second lieutenants until places are found for them to be assigned to.

Mr. PLUMB. The fact that there is only a very small number of officers of the Army now in proportion to the number of privates—which I presume is a good thing, of course—would seem to offer an opportunity to increase the number of officers. While I speak of that in deference to the popular notion about the Army, I rather think myself that the provision of the appropriation bill a number of years ago ought to be carried out now; that is to say, some of these young men should go back into civil life from the academy. I do not think we have too many of them; in fact I think it would be better for the military establishment that sometimes does our fighting, as the regular Army does not, that we should have dispersed throughout the country a large number of educated military men from whom we might draw in case of necessity and who on the occasion arising would by reason of that education come to the front readily at a call to arms and be qualified to take places of responsibility in the organization and management and direction of the volunteer forces of the country.

I think that in place of carrying along a lot of supernumerary officers, however meritorious they may be as persons, it would be better to let them go back into civil life and give them the seven or eight hundred or a thousand dollars, or whatever it is, that the bill of 1879 provided for.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I wish simply to say in this connection that there are practically no supernumerary officers in the Army. I have before me a list of officers serving by order of Congress in different positions and taken away from their regular commands, very much indeed to the damage of their commands: as military instructors at colleges, 39; at the Military Academy, 35; at the artillery school, Fort Monroe, 25; at the infantry school, Fort Leavenworth, 65; at the torpedo school, 3; in the Signal Service, 45; permanently incapacitated and awaiting retirement, 30; making about 240 officers withdrawn from their commands by order of Congress, except in the case of those incapacitated, over the number on the retired-list. This takes practically one officer from each company, leaving a captain and one lieutenant to a company, which I submit is certainly a minimum allowance.

The provisions of this bill provide for these graduates for only a very short period of time, because the casualties of the service will provide vacancies for these twenty-eight surplus officers within three or four months. It simply carries them on the roll for three or four months rather than lose the services of members of a class which is looked upon as one of the most distinguished that has ever been graduated at West Point.

Mr. PLUMB. There are, I think, about 2,500 officers in the Army now; rather more, I think, than 1 to 10 private soldiers. Speaking from an examination that I made some time ago I should say it was about 1 to 8. There are 10 per cent., according to the statement of the Senator from New Jersey, of the officers who are now detailed by act of Congress for certain other duties not in connection with their commands. We all know how details of Army officers are sought for. I presume no legislation has produced such harrowing feelings and such general distress of mind as that which authorizes Army officers to be detailed. The detail of these officers from serving with their companies on the frontiers among the Indians is really one of the most creditable things I know of; and I hope that in view of what the Senator from New Jersey has said Congress will make haste to restore these young men to the companies from which they are taken by law and which they undoubtedly would go back to with very great haste if they got the opportunity!

Mr. LOGAN. There is one point in this bill that, although suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, is not as well understood as it might be.

What is the object of the provision of the bill which the Senator from Kansas has called attention to? For about eighty years the auditing officers of the Treasury Department have construed the law so that at the graduation of cadets they have been paid the allowance of a second lieutenant up to and including the time when they should be nominated for the office by the President. So they were borne on the roll, so far as receiving pay was concerned, from their graduation up to the time of their appointment as second lieutenants. A short time ago the Second Comptroller of the Treasury decided that these young men were not entitled to pay as second lieutenants, that they were merely candidates for the office and could not receive pay, entirely changing the construction of the Government, as I say, for eighty years, leaving these young men who are graduates without pay; in other words, out in the cold, if I may use that expression. This bill is intended to put it in the law that they shall be on the rolls as second lieutenants, and receive pay up to the time that there is a vacancy; and, in order that there shall be no misconstruction of the law, it is provided in this bill that they shall be promoted to the position of second lieutenant, and in that way they become a part of the Army, although not on duty as a part of the Army having an assigned place, but as a part of the Army that they may receive their pay. That is the object of this bill, and I think a very proper one.

So far as the effect of having an excess is concerned, I do not care to go into that discussion. This is providing for the Army and the cadets as they stand to-day or will at their graduation. So far as any injustice may have been done or may now be done to others, I do not care to say anything at this time, because it does not come up in connection with this bill. It is a mere question as to whether this construction of the accounting officer of the Treasury Department may be changed, so that these young men shall get their pay and be on the roll from their graduation up to the time they enter the service under a regular appointment. That is all there is of it except the promotion feature.

Mr. INGALLS. When they are appointed after graduation to fill these vacancies, do they require confirmation by the Senate?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. Then it appears to me, if the object of the committee was to provide that those for whom no vacancies exist should continue to be eligible and under pay, it is very doubtful whether this last clause would accomplish that result:

And in case there shall not at the time be a vacancy in such arm or corps, he may—

That is, the superfluous graduate may—at the discretion of the President, be promoted and commissioned in it as an additional second lieutenant, with the usual pay and allowances of a second lieutenant, until a vacancy shall happen.

Of course we can not in any way impair or impugn the prerogative of the President as the appointing power; and if it were sure that he would regard this discretion lodged in him as imposing any obligation on him to designate these superfluous graduates as additional second lieutenants the evil would be corrected; but otherwise it will not be. There is nothing in the language that renders it incumbent on the President to appoint these, even if we could by language do that. But it appears to me that we might certainly do something more than that, provide that these superfluous graduates shall remain in the line of promotion and be under pay. We ought not to leave that to the discretion of the President.

Mr. SEWELL. Where language of this kind has been used in laws, I do not know any case where the President has failed to carry it out in connection with the military arm of the service.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say in the hearing of the Senator from Kansas that that language was used intentionally by the committee for the reason that we understand the President need not nominate any of these graduates unless he desires to do so, no matter what the law may be. The power rests in him to send the nomination to the Senate. I do not know of any power that can force him to do it.

Mr. INGALLS. But we could change the law so as to lodge this designation elsewhere, if we pleased.

Mr. LOGAN. I think not so far as the Army is concerned; but that makes no difference now. It is the language that is commonly used, "in the discretion of the President." For instance, if we suggest in the law to-day that a certain person shall be put on the retired-list, we say it may be done in the discretion of the President. The President has always taken it as a suggestion from the Congress of the United States that that is desired, and therefore he has always carried it out. I have never known an instance in which it has not been done. That is the usual language, and it is used for that reason, because in respect to this question discretion is lodged by the Constitution in the President, and therefore we do not say to him that he must or shall do a certain thing which we have no right to direct; but I have no doubt that any President heretofore or in the future will always carry out a suggestion of that kind in a law that is made for that purpose, knowing at the time that these persons are the only ones who are mentioned by the law, the only ones intended to be embraced in the law, and he certainly would carry out the suggestion made to him by Congress. That was discussed by the committee at the time the bill was under consideration.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. What was the view of the committee upon this particular point of the discretion allowed in this bill to the President? Suppose the President should deem it advisable not to appoint any of these superfluous graduates, he believing, as a matter of policy, that the Army did not need them, and so he should take no course whatever; is it the view of the committee that the language used here, "at the discretion of the President," authorizes him to take that negative course; or is that language limited and intended by the committee to be limited to the exercise of the discretion on the part of the President as to where he shall send these young men? Which way does the committee leave that?

Mr. LOGAN. The committee leaves it in this way: It is not suggesting to the President that he exercise the discretion; but it is only recognizing that discretion which rests in him now as President.

Mr. HALE. Not to make any appointment, if he so chooses?

Mr. LOGAN. He is not required to make any nomination now unless he chooses to do so. Therefore we merely make it as a suggestion to him that these persons are entitled to this provided he wishes to make the appointments.

Mr. HALE. But if the President should conclude that the Army does not need these gentlemen and makes no appointments, then under this bill they go into civil life.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, not at all.

Mr. HALE. Where do they go?

Mr. LOGAN. They go on the roll. Under the false construction, as I deem it, of the Second Comptroller, they are not entitled to pay; but this bill puts them on the roll to receive pay, and they will receive it, having the assimilated ranks of second lieutenants until they shall be appointed. If the President shall not appoint any one, the Army may go without appointments until the President sends the nominations here. This does not change the law at all in that respect.

Mr. HALE. I was seeking information as to whether this clause, "at the discretion of the President," would in any way give him the power to contravene the evident purpose of the bill to keep these young men in the service.

Mr. LOGAN. I think not. It leaves the law as it is now, in his discretion.

Mr. HALE. Now one other question. General Drum in his communication, which forms part of these papers, says:

> The assignments of additional lieutenants should, however, be limited so as not to exceed three to the Engineer Corps and one to each regiment.

I do not discover in the bill any limitation whatever. Is there anything in it that the chairman or the Senator in charge of the bill believes prevents these assignments being made in one branch of the Army?

Mr. SEWELL. They are to be assigned in accordance with the manner in which they graduate, not more than three or four to the Engineer Corps, and the rest to the ordnance, cavalry, artillery, and infantry.

Mr. HALE. Why does the Senator say they will be so assigned when there is nothing in the bill that relates to assignment?

Mr. SEWELL. The existing law provides for it, as well as the custom.

Mr. HALE. General Drum, an old Army officer, very vigilant and thoroughly well-informed, says that the bill should be limited, so that but three can be assigned to the Engineer Corps and one to each regiment.

Mr. LOGAN. What do you refer to?

Mr. HALE. I find it in the correspondence.

Mr. SEWELL. The surplus number would not be more than the limit mentioned by General Drum, and we did not consider there was any necessity for putting in the limit.

Mr. HALE. That was the reason it is not in the bill then?

Mr. SEWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The rule now in graduations at West Point is that those who graduate the highest in numbers are assigned to the Engineer Corps, and the others to the cavalry, artillery, and infantry, according to the classification made by the board of examination. They classify the graduates in that way, and they are assigned by the President according to the classification given. General Drum is Adjutant-General. No law requires the President to appoint these men; but the same rule governs their assignment that has existed heretofore, and this bill does not change it in the slightest.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator believe that the rule invariably observed in these appointments will cover the point raised by General Drum?

Mr. LOGAN. I do.

Mr. PLUMB. It does not seem to me that that necessarily follows. For instance here is a class of seventy-eight graduates who are eligible to appointment as second lieutenants in the Army, and from those who graduate first in their class will be chosen the number necessary to go into the Engineer Corps to fill existing vacancies, as I understand. What will remain after the vacancies are all filled in the different corps of the Army, the engineers, artillery, infantry, and so on? Those left will be those at the foot of the class, I should think. How then is this rule to be applied to the twenty-eight beyond the vacancies?

Mr. HALE. The proportion will be the same.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think that is proper, and I am going to move an amendment that there shall be no appointment at all from the surplus to the Engineer Corps. In the first place if the present rule is right this will violate it, because out of the fifty persons who shall be appointed to fill vacancies ten, say, will go into the Engineer Corps who graduate with the first ten numbers in the class. There will be forty below that who under the proper application of the rule would be better entitled by reason of qualifications than the twenty-eight who are left at the foot of the list. But the Engineer Corps of the Army is overburdened already; that is to say, there are more officers in it than there ought to be, and it is especially a favorite branch of the Army, because no officer serves in that corps below the rank of captain over fourteen years without promotion, a provision very generous to that branch of the service, saying nothing now about its impropriety. It is in very sharp contrast with what prevails in all the other corps of the Army. I do not believe in adding any more to that branch of the service than those who come to it in the ordinary way necessary to fill vacancies. So I would make an exception in line 8 and say:

> Except in that of the Engineer.

So that there shall be no appointment from these surplus cadets to the Corps of Engineers at all.

Mr. SEWELL. I would oppose such an amendment.

Mr. HALE. I hope that the amendment the Senator from Kansas proposes will be carried. I agree with him fully that the Engineer Corps, which takes from the top of each graduating list the brightest and best spirits of this young service, ought not to be burdened or increased by men who are at the lower end of the class. The Engineer Corps is the select corps in its privileges and service—the crack corps of the Army. It is a prize toward which every cadet is reaching out and striving to attain, and so keep his rank in the graduating class that he may be assigned to that corps; and it is supposed and believed that the brightest spirits in the service are put into that corps. I do not mean that they are always so; I do not mean that the record of the great wars of the past has shown that the Engineer Corps furnishes the greatest commanders, but all the same it is a fact that the cadets are striving to get into that corps. It is the prize of high rank in the graduating class, and here is an exception when we put in this number of graduates at the lower end of the class. I believe and agree with the Senator from Kansas that there ought to be none of them put into the Engineer Corps. Let them be assigned to the other corps in the Army, and let not that distinction, whether it is right or wrong, be broken that has always been maintained in assigning cadets to the Engineer Corps.

Mr. LOGAN. I presume I do not understand this bill. I thought I did.

Mr. HALE. The Senator understands it a great deal better than I do. I am seeking information more than giving it.

Mr. LOGAN. If I understand anything about the Army—I do not claim to understand very much—I know that when these twenty-eight come to be assigned the Engineer Corps will be full. The first on the list will have been assigned to it before these men are designated as persons who have to stay out in the cold until they can be assigned. So this does not affect it in the slightest.

Mr. HALE. It does not interfere, of course, with the assignment to the Engineer Corps from this graduating class, but out of the lower end of the class it does take three and pass them to the Engineer Corps.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg your pardon; it does no such thing. It assigns them where they are competent to perform the duty, and if they have not graduated as engineers they are assigned as cavalry or infantry or whatever they are best qualified for.

Mr. HALE. I would not have them put into the Engineer Corps at all; I would not have them sent there. I would make an exception of it.

Mr. SEWELL. There are, say, three or four vacancies in the Engineer Corps; they are filled from the head of the class. The cadets all have their standing as they graduate. They are second lieutenants awaiting appointment to the Army. General Drum suggests that three be assigned to the Engineer Corps rather than go into the infantry or cavalry. So the committee is trying to protect the young gentlemen who graduate highest, while the Senator from Maine is trying to put them down.

Mr. HALE. I do not see it. Where will this surplus list of graduates come from if it does not come from the lower end?

Mr. SEWELL. They go to the infantry. The first three or four in the class go into the Engineer Corps, and then more, to the extent of three, say, will be assigned as brevet second lieutenants to the Engineer Corps.

Mr. HALE. Before the rest are distributed?

Mr. SEWELL. Before the rest are distributed, if they prefer it.

Mr. HALE. I do not know, of course, how this designation will be made; but I suppose that the rule would be that all the vacancies that the Army has that will absorb this large class will be filled. Suppose there are fifty. I should think the needs of the Army would be supplied from the upper fifty in the class, so as to fill vacancies existing in every arm of the military service. The fifty will be distributed among the different corps. I suppose you will not be confronted with the question of where you will designate the surplus until you have put the fifty into the service that are needed in the service. When that is done it is found there are twenty-eight superfluous men who must necessarily be at the bottom of the class, because the fifty will be taken from the head of the class.

Mr. SEWELL. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. There is a certain standing in the class which must be obtained before a graduate can get into the Engineer Corps.

Mr. HALE. That we all understand; that is the very thing the Senator from Kansas and I are seeking, that these men of lower grade in graduation, of less competency as shown by their numbers, shall not be put in the Engineer Corps.

Mr. SEWELL. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas would exclude them altogether. There will be a number of cadets graduated this year, more than the vacancies in the Engineer Corps, and at least three of them ought to be assigned as acting officers in that corps. This bill the committee think will attain that object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that he has not enforced the rule, because the debate has been conversational, but he will feel bound to enforce it hereafter.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend the amendment of the committee, in line 8, after the word "Army," by inserting the words "except in that of the Engineer Corps."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend, in line 8, after the word "Army," by inserting "except in that of the Engineer Corps;" so as to read:

He may be promoted and commissioned as a second lieutenant in any arm or corps of the Army, except in that of the Engineer Corps, in which there may be a vacancy.

Mr. PLUMB. There is probably some misunderstanding in this matter. If I do know anything about the military service it is not that men graduate at the Military Academy as engineers, but that those who graduate the highest have the choice of that place to the extent of the vacancies existing in it. As they have the choice, they undoubtedly choose this aristocratic, or this exclusive, or this favorite branch of the service, whichever you may call it. The course of study which they go through is not different from that which is prosecuted by and observed by all the other members of the class; but it happens that every member of the class has a rank separate for himself, and that he is graded according to that rank by a number—No. 1, No. 2, and so on down. If there are three or four vacancies in the Engineer Corps, practically by the operation of a rule which has perhaps come to have quite the force of law, the three highest or four highest go into the Engineer Corps as of course. Next to that comes the Ordnance Corps, next the cavalry; and, last of all, the infantry, the most useful arm of the service, catches those who graduate the lowest.

When we come to the graduating class of next June we shall have, say, fifty vacancies—that is the estimate of the Senator from New Jersey—and twenty-eight superfluous cadets. If there are three vacancies in the Engineer Corps, the three highest will go there. Similarly, the next highest will fill the vacancies in the Ordnance Corps, and the next highest in the cavalry, and so on, until there will be twenty-eight superfluous young men at the foot of the list who are to go into the Army as additional second lieutenants under this bill. It is provided here that these men shall go into such corps as they may be judged competent to perform the duties of. Judged by whom? Is the President to carry on a special examination for the purpose of determining where they shall go? Not at all. The Senator from New Jersey says the academic board is to determine, but the academic board has already fixed their relative status by numbering them at the foot of the list.

There is nothing here to prevent the President from saying, "I think, on the whole, that John Jones, who is No. 51, or Stephen Smith, who is No. 78, taking into consideration the fact that our great soldiers have generally come from the men who graduated pretty low down in the list, is just as competent to be an engineer as anybody, and I will designate him for that corps;" and he puts him on the waiting-list for a vacancy to occur in the Engineer Corps of the Army. That is exactly what will happen. You can tell in the Engineer Corps more nearly what vacancies are going to happen than in any other corps of the Army, because, as I have said before, no man is permitted to serve there, in a rank below that of captain, fourteen years until he is promoted, of course. So, by running over the list you can tell what vacancies will occur by promotion and will be able to anticipate them. So the President will be able to say next June there will be three, four, five, or six vacancies in the Engineer Corps besides those which will be the result of ordinary casualty. Therefore he can set aside out of the twenty-eight surplus men a number to fill those vacancies, and he can assign the rest of the class indiscriminately around among the other corps of the Army.

The Senator from New Jersey says he does not want that, as I understand him. If he does not want it, then the words I have proposed to insert will accomplish exactly the purpose he has in view. If he does want it, I say it is not fair, because we violate the rule under which these young gentlemen have got in the academy by giving to No. 51 and from that on down to No. 78 privileges which they are not as well entitled to as the men who occupy positions above No. 51 and who are apportioned out among the vacancies that have already occurred in the corps of ordnance, cavalry, artillery, infantry, and so on. I want these young men to have that same position in the Army that they are entitled to by reason of the position in which they graduate. Besides that I do not want the Engineer Corps further increased.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Kansas want his amendment in line 8, which applies simply to the regular graduates when there is a vacancy, or would it be better to have it in line 12?

And in case there shall not, at the time, be a vacancy in such arm or corps, he may, at the discretion of the President, be promoted and commissioned in any such corps, excepting the Engineer Corps.

Would not that be better?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Maine is correct. My amendment should come in in line 12.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope it will not come in any line, either the eighth or the twelfth. I do not wish to enter into a discussion here as to the Engineer Corps, or what they have done, or what they may do in the future. Both Senators who desire to amend this bill I believe have insisted that the Engineer Corps was the favorite corps in the Army. That may be; and the very course pursued by the two Senators here this morning is what has made it the favorite corps of the Army. Nothing can be done in Congress about the Army without some exception being made for the Engineer Corps. They live closer to Washington than the rest of the Army. If I should be called upon to ask, why is it that this corps is the excepted corps always, I could not tell except that they have more friends in Congress than any other corps of the Army.

I am not going to say whether or not it is an aristocratic corps, as the Senator from Kansas said it was; but it seems that certain Senators and Representatives in Congress have an idea that if a man or a boy shall graduate from school at the head of his class, that proves that he is the ablest man in that class. It does not prove any such thing, so far as West Point is concerned. The man who gets the most spots on his pants during his term of service there is the man who generally graduates the lowest in his class. It is not the gentleman who is the most intellectual that graduates the highest always, but the man who has the fewest marks against him in the examination of graduates; and the marks against him on account of conduct are considered by the committee in his graduation. It is not always the case that the man with the greatest ability graduates at the head of the class. Not only that, but there is no army to be found anywhere where the great leaders of the army are in the engineer corps. You always go to the infantry, the cavalry, or the artillery to find the great leaders of your armies, and not to the engineer corps.

Why should they be made an exception? Here is the Congress of the United States petting a corps, making an exception in favor of this one corps always. Show me a great work in this country to-day, like the opening of the mouth of the Mississippi River, or building your great bridges, that has not been done by civil engineers rather than by the Engineer Corps of the Army. So it will not do to claim that they are, par excellence, the corps that must always be provided for, and everybody else, like the infantry, do the hard service of the Army. I have no complaint to make against this corps. They are honorable gentlemen; they do their duty; but because a man belongs to the Engineer Corps it is not complete evidence in favor of his being the best qualified man of his class for that particular corps.

When three are selected for it, the next three, for instance, in the graduating class might prefer to be assigned as additional second lieutenants in the corps, that they may step in when vacancies occur in the corps. Certainly the fact that a man is only No. 6 in a large class like this does not prove that he is not a man capable of making a good engineer. Grant graduated near the foot of his class. He was a fair soldier. Sheridan, who I believe is a fair soldier, had to be suspended on account of failing in the examination, and had to be put over for a year before he could graduate at all. He made a fair soldier, it seems to me. So you may go through our armies and you do not find the gentlemen who stood No. 1 in the classes to be the men who led our armies in the great war through which we have recently passed, nor in any other war. They are the students, I admit, and generally the best students, but they are not always the best soldiers by a great deal.

I desire that this bill shall pass as reported from the committee by the Senator from New Jersey, or else, if these gentlemen desire that these graduates shall stay out in the cold and have no footing and be out of the Army, vote the bill down. I hope it will not be amended.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Illinois has only said at length and in much more eloquent fashion than I did what I had already propounded with reference to these different grades and ranks in the Army. I did not in any way claim that the real merit and skill and greatness of the Army of the United States is found or has been found lodged in the Engineer Corps. On the other hand, I stated distinctly that all military service and the exploits of the United States Army had brought out the fact that the great commanders came from other corps. I agree with the Senator fully with regard to that, and I am making no fight here as a champion of the Engineer Corps. I care nothing whatever about it; but all the same it is considered in the Army as the desirable place for a cadet to be put into when he graduates at West Point, and every cadet is striving in one way or another to seek the head of his class so as to be put in that corps. And it is not a matter of favoritism because the Engineer Corps lies nearer to the doors of Senators and Members of Congress that it has this favorite position in the Army. It is from the beginning. The graduates of the Academy who graduate for merit are put into this corps. I do not fancy that if Congress should beseech the board to assign these officers any other assignment would be made; but they are put into this corps, and it is understood that the heads of the list, if there are four vacancies, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, will be put into the Engineer Corps, Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 will be put into the Ordnance Corps.

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator allow me? Suppose Nos. 5, 6, and 7 be practically of the same class as Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. HALE. They are all of the same class.

Mr. SEWELL. All the same grade in the class. Suppose Nos. 5, 6, and 7 wish to enter the Engineer Corps, under this bill they will be considered part of the service on a waiting commission.

Mr. HALE. That discloses what has not been disclosed before.

Mr. SEWELL. That is what this bill is intended for.

Mr. HALE. That has not been stated before. Then it is the design of this bill that the four vacancies, we will say, which exist in the corps shall be filled by Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4. Then without waiting to fill the other corps of the Army, three men shall be set aside—5, 6, and 7 in number—and are to wait to be put into the Engineer Corps. Is that the plan?

Mr. SEWELL. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Then as to the subsequent ones, how is it? You then go on and put five into the Ordnance Corps. Suppose three or four men want to be put into the Ordnance Corps, are the next succeeding numbers to be set aside and wait until there is a vacancy in the Ordnance Corps and then be put in? And then you go to the artillery and fill them, appointing six or eight, and then are you to set three or four more men aside to wait for artillery vacancies? Let me ask the Senator from New Jersey if that is the correct purpose of the bill?

Mr. SEWELL. I have stated the purpose.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the bill; I do not want these young men thrown out; but why does not the Senator state clearly what his purpose is, so that it may be seen? It is one thing if a large number are to be put into the Engineer Corps. It is another thing to go down and take No. 5 out after 2, 3, and 4, as the Senator from Kansas said, and put them into the Engineer Corps, because that would give them an advantage over the other boys who are higher up on the list. I should be very glad to know definitely just what the bill does mean.

Mr. SEWELL. I can not explain it any further than I have. I have repeatedly said that it was the intention of the committee to class the graduates who go into the Engineer Corps, who are expected to be more than the vacancies occurring at this time or will occur by the 1st of July, say to the extent of three; and the committee desire that the provisions of the bill shall be such that those three young men shall go into the service and be assigned to the Engineer Corps.

Mr. DAWES. May I inquire if the Senator means by that men who would otherwise under existing law go to other corps shall be reserved for the Engineer Corps?

Mr. SEWELL. Yes. There will be more graduates of that class this year than usual.

Mr. DAWES. Of those entitled to enter the Engineer Corps?

Mr. SEWELL. More entitled to go into the Engineer Corps.

Mr. DAWES. How many are there?

Mr. SEWELL. We can not now tell.

Mr. DAWES. There are none entitled by law, as I understand, to go into the Engineer Corps who do not graduate within a certain number of the head of the class, and five of those are entitled to go into the Engineer Corps if there are so many vacancies. Now, I understand from the remarks of the Senator that there are not five vacancies, so that the five who would otherwise go into that corps would find a place elsewhere. So those who do not have the opportunity of being appointed are to be on waiting orders?

Mr. SEWELL. Instead of going into the other corps.

Mr. DAWES. So it does not disarrange the existing law, but only provides for those who would otherwise go in but fail to go in for the want of vacancies?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to make a single remark. I wish to know if I am not right in supposing that the assignment of cadets who graduate to the various arms of the service is now in the discretion of the President, the Commander-in-Chief, and that there is no statute which says that the highest five, in the way they number up their order of excellence, shall go into the Engineer Corps. I do not understand that there is any such statute. It is a mere regulation of the service. That being so, then it is clear to my mind that this bill only operates to extend the act of 1878, which threw any surplus for which there were not vacancies into private life, and to extend the effect of the military laws to those under the same regulations that exist as to all the others.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that the whole effect of this bill simply is to put all the graduates on the same footing as they would be but for the act of 1878, which said that the surplus for whom there were no vacancies, after they had been educated by the Government in the military life and had taken it up, should be retired to private life. That is all there is to it and all there is of the bill, so that if the existing law is right as to those who may fill any kind of a vacancy, then this measure is right, which merely extends the number of people who are to be attached to the service, according to the discretion of the President that he now has as to all the others, to one arm or to the other. That seems to me to be right.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Vermont has said better than I could have done it just precisely what was in my mind when I rose at the time that he got the floor. If there be any criticism upon the present organization of the Army it can find its vent in some other bill. The committee simply attempted to do what it considered to be a matter of justice in this one single point.

There is an exceptionally good class at West Point. They have run the gauntlet of all the severe examinations and all the various tests much better than any class that has been there in many years. To the surprise of the professors, there are to be graduated next June seventy-six, or seventy-eight in all, well-qualified young men. This is so unusual and unexpected that, if the law as at present be literally enforced, some of those young men will be thrown directly out, after we have educated them, and when they have answered the purpose of our education unexpectedly well.

If by saving up some of the vacancies that are occurring now through ordinary casualties and otherwise there shall be found to be quite a large number of vacancies waiting for them next June, then if we hold them a little the other vacancies coming shortly after June will supply places for the rest of them. I have no business to speak of the executive department, but I can utter my suspicion that the President is doing what I think he ought to do, that is to say, he is not filling up the vacancies now occurring by appointing from civil life, but is keeping them open, as I think, for this unexpectedly large class. If he is doing so, and I have a suspicion of it, this measure may find a co-operation in advance on the part of the War Department and the President which will save these young men, who especially deserve to be saved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 7, after the word "corps," insert the words "of the Army in which there may be a vacancy and;" so as to read:

He may be appointed and commissioned as a second lieutenant in any arm or corps of the Army in which there may be a vacancy, and the duties of which he may have been judged competent to perform.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 11, after the word "may," strike out the words "attached to it;" so as to read:

And in case there shall not, at the time, be a vacancy in such arm or corps, he may, at the discretion of the President, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 12, after the word "President," to insert "be promoted and commissioned in it;" so as to read:

At the discretion of the President, be promoted and commissioned in it as an additional second lieutenant, with the usual pay and allowances of a second lieutenant, until a vacancy shall happen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMSHIP CAROLINE MILLER.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to call attention to the bill (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] is now in. I am unalterably opposed to admitting foreign-built ships to American registry. This is clearly an exceptional case, but I am satisfied that there should be a written report to accompany the bill clearly indicating why it is an exceptional case. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Maryland may file a written report in this case.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Maryland will have authority to file a written report at this session.

MARY B. HOLMES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be announced.

The bill (S. 806) granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that a bill (S. 2607) was passed by both Houses of the Forty-eighth Congress, second session, and approved by the President on the 3d of March, 1885, granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes, the widow of John W. Holmes; and that by an error in the name of John W. Holmes (who was in that act styled "Henry" W. Holmes) Mary B. Holmes was precluded from obtaining such pension as was granted in the act.

The bill proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary B. Holmes, widow of John W. Holmes, late a lieutenant of Company F, Seventy-second Regiment New York Volunteers, and allow her the same pension drawn by her husband during his life, to take effect from the date of the approval of the former act by the President, on the 3d of March, 1885.

Mr. PLATT. What was the amount drawn by her husband during his life?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SEWELL January 18, 1886:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 806) granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes, having examined the same, report as follows:

The committee find upon examination of this case that a bill (S. 2607) granting a pension to the said Mary B. Holmes, widow of John W. Holmes, was passed at the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress and approved by the President on the 3d day of March, 1885.

That owing to an error in the name of the said John W. Holmes (who was in said act styled "Henry" W. Holmes) the said Mary B. Holmes was precluded from obtaining such pension as was granted by said act.

The committee, therefore, in manifest justice to Mrs. Holmes, desire to, and herewith do, present as their report that made by the Committee on Pensions last year, and with the same favorable recommendation for its re-enactment, as follows:

Petitioner is the widow of John W. Holmes, late lieutenant Company F, Seventy-second Regiment New York Volunteers, who was pensioned at the rate of $15 per month on account of disability incurred in the service and resulting from disease of the eyes and chronic diarrhea. Her husband was killed by a freight train in New York city in 1881, and his widow is now destitute. She asks a pension on the ground that the accident which caused his death was the result of his defective vision and not of his own carelessness or neglect. The soldier's death, under these circumstances, did not, of course, result directly from his military service, but does seem to have been due to the disability incurred in the service, and to that extent was a result thereof.

Taking this view of the case, your committee are disposed to regard the claim as a meritorious one, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. This re-enacts an act passed last year, and corrects a mistake which was made in a letter of the name of the husband of Mrs. Holmes. The bill pays the sum allowed the husband, whatever that was.

Mr. PLATT. That may discriminate.

Mr. SEWELL. It was a pension allowed by law.

Mr. PLATT. We do not know whether it was the pension allowed by law. The husband may have been allowed $100 a month, or $72 a month, or $50 a month, and in that case his widow would get a great deal more than other widows.

Mr. SEWELL. I will state for the information of the Senator that the pension of a lieutenant is $20 a month.

Mr. PLATT. What was his rank?

Mr. SEWELL. First lieutenant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lieutenant in Company F, Seventy-second New York, according to the act passed before. Let the bill be read again.

Mr. PLATT. It does not describe him as a lieutenant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I think it would be well for greater security to insert a provision in the bill repealing the former act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived——

Mr. HOAR. Let this matter be disposed of. I move that the bill be amended by adding as an additional section that the act referred to, giving the date, is hereby repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That the act of March 3, 1885, granting her a pension, be repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as an additional section:

SEC. —. That an act granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes, widow of John B. Holmes, approved March 3, 1885, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I wish this bill might lie over. I presume it is all right, but——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to announce that, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the bill goes over, and the unfinished business will be proceeded with.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor upon the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I had not taken the floor formally, but if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has not anything to say now, I can go on.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator may proceed now.

Mr. MORGAN. Before proceeding to discuss the bill it is necessary, so far as my understanding of it is concerned, that there should be a little more definite statement in the bill upon one subject. Many of the most important provisions of the bill are made to depend upon the question of time, when the year begins at which the appropriation shall take effect, whether at the beginning of a fiscal year or at the beginning of a calendar year. For instance, the governors of the different States and Territories are to make certain reports for the preceding year on the condition of the schools and the school fund, the manner of managing the schools, &c. There is no time fixed in the bill either at which the payments are to commence under it, whether at the beginning of a fiscal year or at the end of a fiscal year, or at the beginning or end of a calendar year. For the purpose of getting that subject a little more definitely understood, I move to amend the bill in section 1, line 3, by inserting after the word "eight" the word "fiscal," so that the text will read:

That for eight fiscal years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated, &c.

Inasmuch as the bill is entirely silent as to the time when the appropriation shall take effect and as to the time when the reports are to be made, I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that perhaps it is an oversight, and we had better have that subject arranged as we go along.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama desire to have the amendment acted upon at this time?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 3, after the word "eight," it is proposed to insert "fiscal;" so as to read:

That for eight fiscal years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury," &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. When the bill was under consideration by the Senate in the last Congress, and before it was passed, the matter to which the Senator from Alabama alludes was discussed. It was well understood and must be apparent to any one that the bill is inoperative until there has been an appropriation. I do not think the amendment suggested would be of the slightest consequence in the way of facilitating the purposes of the bill. It might result in postponing its operation for a year when otherwise it might be made efficient. I think the amendment would do no good, and might do harm. At all events, I do not see any object in the Senator pressing it at this moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that the bill will be entirely inoperative unless it is sustained by an annual appropriation.

Mr. BLAIR. That is very well understood. It was discussed, and the Senator will find that it was thoroughly discussed in the debates as reported in the last Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. Before we get through with the bill I shall try to put some language into it which will express that idea a little more distinctly than it is in the bill, so that there shall not be an appropriation now for ten years to come, but it shall be an appropriation to be made by Congress annually.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will have no difficulty in putting language in which will mean just what the bill does now, if he thinks it is necessary, and if the Senate should also think that anything more is necessary to make the terms of the bill explicit. An annual appropriation of the amount specified in the bill will be required of course every year, and if in any one year it was found that there were abuses in its administration, either in all the States or in any one State or Territory, the appropriation so far as that State or Territory, or all the States, as the case might be, would be of course withheld. Congress retains under the terms of the bill full discretionary power over the appropriation of public money to guard against all abuses, as well by investigation as by withholding the appropriations themselves.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand the Senator to say that Congress retains all discretionary power over the management of this fund.

Mr. BLAIR. I certainly understand it so. It is of course the scheme of the bill to commence and to continue in a way to give assistance to the schools. It would be but an injury to schools to appropriate only for a single year, unless abuses should arise which should change the general policy to be pursued with reference to this matter. To give schools one year $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 and leave them without anything whatever the year following of course would result in the practical loss of all that already had been expended, because the matter of education is not to be completed in a single year. But in order that there be no waste, in order that there be no abuse, the legislative power by the terms of this proposed act retains the right of review and alteration of the law. In fact there is a section near the close of the bill, which was moved in the last Congress by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and was incorporated in the bill itself near the close of the discussion, providing that the act may be altered, amended, or repealed. That was the substance of it.

If, however, the expenditures made from year to year shall operate beneficially, in order that the most good may result from what is appropriated, it would be necessary that the proper amount of appropriations should be continued until a real impression had been created upon the illiteracy of the country. It is entitled a bill for temporary aid. It has no purpose—so far as I know there is no purpose on the part of any one interested in the enactment of the bill into a law that the aid shall be permanent. It is only for a temporary purpose, to advance those portions of the country which are below the proper standard of education where illiteracy prevails to such an extent as to be dangerous to the public welfare. In those communities, and in all communities throughout the entire land, the design and object is to give aid only until this excess or superabundance of illiteracy shall have been removed and something like a fair average of intelligence shall be found to prevail throughout the country at large. That is the only object of the bill.

I myself am one of those who would be very reluctant indeed to see the school system for the States become permanently dependent upon aid from the General Government. This measure is for an exceptional condition of things, for an emergency in public affairs, and nothing more. As the Senator must see, a bill which is operative only for eight years, which gives assistance only for that period of time, does not contemplate anything like permanency of the system. It has been, I believe, adjudged by educators, as they call themselves, in this country that the average period of common-school education is not more than four or five years. The original bill as reported by the committee in the Forty-eighth Congress contemplated appropriations for ten years, which would cover the average of two generations of common-school life. The Senate thought fit to reduce it by amendment to eight years, and that at the utmost would not be more than two generations of common-school education.

If the children of the States having had these opportunities for eight years should not then be sufficiently enamored with the benefits of education to maintain their school system—meanwhile having accumulated additional wealth, and being better able to maintain such a system if they considered it beneficial—if, I say, at the end of that period they should fail to do so, I for one should be in favor of their settling the question for themselves, and if they should not see fit to maintain their common schools let them suffer from the ills of ignorance.

Mr. MORGAN. The reason why I think some period ought to be prescribed in the statute when the appropriation should take effect is found on reading the third section, and, in fact, in several other sections in the bill. The third section provides—

> That no State or Territory shall receive any of the benefits of this act until the governor thereof shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, showing the character of the common-school system in force in such State or Territory; the amount of money expended therein during the last preceding school year in the support of common schools, not including expenditures for the rent, repair, or erection of school-houses, &c.
> The Secretary of the Interior shall thereupon—
> After examining into the reports made by the governors—
> certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the names of the States and Territories which he finds to be entitled to share in the benefits of this act, and also the amount due to each.

There ought to be some period within which a State is required to make the report, and some period within which the Secretary of the Interior is required to make the examination of the reports and to make his certificate to the Secretary of the Treasury upon which the money can be drawn.

The school years, as I understand it, vary very much in the different States. In some of the Southern States the school year does not include a portion of the hottest season of the year; it includes more of the winter season. In other States the school year includes more of the summer season. I believe that is a pretty general fact in the administration of the school system in the different States.

The object, I suppose, is to get a report from the State governments of the most recent condition of the population there as to illiteracy, and also as to the question whether the State has complied with all the requisites of this act. In order to do that, the bill is entirely defective, I think, unless some period for making the reports is fixed. It is a matter of indifference to me whether it is the beginning of the fiscal year or the end of the fiscal year, or whether it is the beginning of the calendar year or the end of the calendar year, or any other period, say the first day of some month in the year; but there should be a period by which time the reports should come in, and a period after that within which the Secretary of the Interior should be required to make the examination and to certify as to the right of a State to receive the subvention which is provided for in this proposed act.

I merely wanted to have an understanding about this of some kind, so that I could intelligently argue the bill upon its merits, not with a view of trying to put some feature into it which would destroy its efficiency, but which would really improve its efficiency if the bill should become a law. The Senator from New Hampshire can state whether he prefers some other period or not, but as I have moved I shall insist upon my amendment to insert the word "fiscal;" so as to read:

> That for eight fiscal years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated, &c.

It seems to me that is the most fitting manner of arranging it, because the Senator himself says that unless Congress makes provision by appropriation for each fiscal year the law ceases to be operative, it has no further effect. He would not say, of course, nor would I say, that such a failure would operate to repeal the law, but it would take out of it all the substance, because there would be nothing provided upon which to carry the law into execution. I think it was an oversight on the part of the committee in not having provided some definite period of time at which the very important investigations and reports are to be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLAIR. I can see no advantage resulting from that amendment, and as I said before, it might operate to prevent the appropriation of the amount specified in the first section in such a way that the country generally might not receive the benefit of the measure on account of the failure of some particular governor or some defect in the way of compliance with the provisions of the bill in a particular locality. There can be nothing more definite that may not be attended with danger. With the terms of the bill as they are now no abuse can arise. The other sections of the bill are clear and definite, and the whole act will have to be construed together. There is no occasion for the amendment, so far as I can see, and I hope it will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for a division.

On a division the ayes were 8.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless the Senator from New Hampshire can give me some reason why these accounts should not be kept by fiscal years, I feel inclined to vote for the amendment. In all the appropriations and in the management of this fund, unless there is some reason that I do not think of now, it seems to me the matter should be by the fiscal year and not by the calendar year.

Mr. BLAIR. Can the Senator give any reason why the bill will be any better with the interpolation of that word? I suppose the Senator was not present during the discussion which has just taken place. The bill provides that there shall annually be appropriated a certain amount. That will have to be done, of course, when there is a session of Congress going on and appropriation committees to act, where the power of appropriation exists. We can not tell exactly when the appropriation may be made. Even the first amount specified in the bill can not be expended until there has been an annual appropriation. The money will be appropriated, I suppose, in the same way that other appropriations are made, but I do not see any advantage in putting in the word "fiscal." After the bill stood the gauntlet of the examination of the honorable Senator from Iowa, who is the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and has been for so many years (for during the last Congress he was consulted in regard to this very section, as I remember, and as he will remember was the case), I can see no reason why we should now, at the very outset of this discussion, find ourselves under the necessity of interpolating the word "fiscal" at the suggestion of an opponent to the bill. When I can see no good resulting from it I do not like to have it done; that is all. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says he thinks that it ought to be so amended, I will withdraw all opposition to the introduction of the word "fiscal."

Mr. ALLISON. I was otherwise engaged when this debate began, but I understood the Senator from Alabama to state that these reports were to be made for fiscal years or for calendar years.

Mr. MORGAN. For one or the other year.

Mr. ALLISON. For one or the other.

Mr. BLAIR. The word "fiscal" is not in the bill, so far as I know.

Mr. MORGAN. Neither is the word "calendar."

Mr. ALLISON. I am perfectly clear that the appropriation should be made for fiscal years, and that any reports made respecting the expenditure of the appropriation should also be by fiscal years. If there is anything in the bill conflicting with that idea I do not care to vote for the Senator's amendment, but if there is not it seems to me that it ought to be made clear in the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I prefer that the Senator should submit his amendment in writing.

Mr. MORGAN. It consists of only one word.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to one point. I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that the reports should also be made for the fiscal year as well as the appropriation. I suppose he means by the appropriation for the fiscal year the fiscal year of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean that the reports should be made for the same period? The fiscal year of the States may be very different from the fiscal year of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state that if we appropriate money for this purpose for any one fiscal year, under whatever authority it is expended, it should be reported to the United States for that particular fiscal year. If that is not done there will be great confusion in the expenditures. That is all I mean to say.

Mr. BLAIR. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has that view of it, there is not the slightest objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment?

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not suppose the friends of this measure are in such great alarm about it, with a majority as they say they had of three-fourths when the question was before the Senate in the last Congress, as that they will shudder at and run away from any proposition whatever to improve it; but yet it seems as if that was the case. It seems as if gentlemen had made up their minds that this bill has got to go through the Senate with every comma in it just as it is and with every phrase in it just as it is, without debate and without discussion almost, and that a Senator who undertakes to improve the bill is to be charged on the floor with getting up in enmity to it, and that his purpose is merely to injure the country by injuring the bill.

If this bad measure should pass, as I conceive it to be a bad measure, I want to take as many of the stings out of it as I know how, and I shall labor honestly and industriously to do it; so that if Congress exercises this arbitrary and unconstitutional power of taxation provided in the bill against the people of the United States, the people shall suffer from it just as little as possible. In voting against and in opposing the measure which is presented here I am not the champion of those who would abridge the powers of Congress; indeed I am no champion of anybody, but I am a humble and a faithful defender of all the rights and liberties of the great body of the people of the United States as they are written in the book. Only that consideration could possibly induce me to stand here to-day against a strong and powerful current of opinion from my own part of the country as expressed by Senators on this floor to try to vindicate that Constitution against an outrageous assault, against a violation at the hands of men who have always professed to be its dearest and truest lovers.

The Senator from New Hampshire, who I believe divides the paternity of this bill with my colleague, for they both claim the paternity of it, informs us in the opening of his remarks that a very vast majority of the people of the United States, and particularly of the South, are ready to catch at this glittering prize. A person would think from his description of us that we are willing to bite at a naked hook if it has got a glittering bauble hanging to it, without any bait on it whatever.

Senators are counting more upon the support of the people of this country in this effort to tax them unjustly than they will be able to realize when within a very few brief years, if this law should go into effect and its administration should ever be begun, the evils which it sows like dragon's teeth throughout every community in the United States will come up as a harvest which they will be compelled to reap in sorrow and to garner with regret.

This is a bill to tax the people of the United States at large $77,000,000 within eight years for the purpose of raising a fund to meet a special emergency of illiteracy, as is alleged, among the people of this country. It is an emergency fund, and the legislation is said to be emergency legislation. The framers of this measure are so much afraid of its consequences and they are so unhappy in their efforts to defend the principles upon which it rests that in advance of all action taken by the Senate upon this question they make the announcement that it is an emergency, and that this provision is an emergency fund. The Senator from New Hampshire says that he would not be in favor of the measure if he believed that it was going to be one of the permanent establishments of this country; that he would not be willing for Congress to undertake the education of the people of the different States as a regular matter of business, as one of its especial duties, and to draw upon its taxing powers to supply the funds and upon the Treasury to pay them. He would be unwilling to incorporate within the Government this new feature of the education of the people at large by means of contributions to be gathered through the taxes that Congress imposes upon the people at large.

If any Senator upon this side of the Chamber or the other should deign to express his views in support of the bill in this debate—for I think none of them are prepared to do so—I shall expect them to follow the line of debate marked out in advance by their distinguished chief from New Hampshire, and to claim, as he claims, that this legislation can only be justified as emergency legislation and to meet a particular condition of unfortunate illiteracy which exists in the United States at this moment of time, and that after they have tried it for eight years, it makes no difference how rich the blessings may be that flow from it or how ruinous the disadvantages may be that come from it, they will be prepared to dismiss this subject from the attention of Congress and fall back into the old rut of legislating for the people in accordance with the powers conferred upon them by the Constitution.

Since I have been here a great deal of emergency legislation has occurred, and I am not prepared now to state that any part of it has really produced solid and substantial advantage to the country. We have had the emergency of tornadoes sweeping across the country, and bills have been introduced to repair the damages inflicted upon forests, upon homes, and upon farms by the winds from heaven. We have had emergencies which in my State required the appropriation of money to buy bacon to feed the population. Large sums were spent in that alleged emergency of starvation for bacon to be used in what were called the overflowed districts along the Warrior and the Tombigbee Rivers. The emergency passed, and with it the bacon; but the emergency passed smoothly into politics, and the bacon, instead of being expended in the swamps of the 'Bigbee and the Warrior, which had been overflowed, was taken up on the heights of Sand Mountain and distributed for the purpose of buying the votes of some of the people.

Many other emergencies to which I could refer have occurred in the history of legislation here, and Congress has never failed to provide for them whenever it could do so and reconcile its action to that class of people who have to work day in and day out to make the money, a dollar at a time, which we spend here $77,000,000 in a single bill. It would take more than a day's work priced at $1.25 for every human being, man, woman, and child, in the United States to meet this emergency—$77,000,000 and 60,000,000 people—and when you take out of the 60,000,000 people the dead-heads and the dead-beats and the non-producers and come to fasten this tax down upon the labor of the men who toil in the fields, in the smitheries, in the mines, in the factories, and in the fisheries to raise the money that is in the Treasury at the farther end of the Avenue, you will not have more than 20,000,000 contributors. Then you have a tax of more than $3 per capita upon them, and by the time you supply all the officials necessary to carry out this grand scheme of benevolence, by the time you have paid all the clerks that will be necessary to investigate these accounts in thirty-eight States and ten Territories, by the time you have oiled the machinery sufficiently to make it run with the money from the people's Treasury, these laboring men who produce all the money that goes into the Treasury, every dollar of it, will have a tax saddled upon them of not less than $10 per capita for this emergency.

If the Senators around me were men who plowed the fields and worked in smitheries and paid the taxes out of the sweat of their brows, I could have more admiration for them while they were voting their own money to educate the children of others; but we know perfectly well that after we leave the fields of agriculture, after we leave the mines and the factories of every description, the fisheries, the grazing plains, and the fruit orchards of this country, we have left all that is productive, all that creates taxes, we have left behind us everything that can place a dollar into the Treasury of the United States.

Let not Senators deceive themselves by thinking that the people of the United States are ignorant. They may not know much of letters, they may not be greatly educated in statesmanship, but they know where the grip of the tax-collector binds, and they inquire diligently and studiously into his power and the rights of those who gave him power over their property. That is the class I represent here to-day. Though they may think I am an enemy and not a friend, they will find me standing by them with sleepless vigilance and I trust with honorable fortitude.

This bill assails that class. It assails them not merely with a taxing power, but it takes from their own pockets their own gold as a bribe, and holds it before their eyes and asks them to submit to taxation in order that they may receive the sham reward. That is done too often in this country. It is done in many systems of laws against which I always object, for I do not see why it is that we should take money out of one pocket of a laboring man and transfer it to the other diminished by the amount that shall stick to the hands of the middle-man as it goes through, and flatter him that we are promoting his welfare.

This is a bill to create offices. It is a bill to elaborate the machinery of government. It is a bill to take away from the people of this country the right to make their voluntary contributions for the education of their own children and to put that sacred duty into the hands of Congress. You take money away from them, pass it through the hands of the new officials, and hand the pittance that is left back to the child of some man who perhaps is more able to educate that child than the man who has had to pay the tax.

Here is a man with a large family, consisting of a wife and ten children, well-to-do and prosperous upon his own labor, who rises with the early dawn and ceases not his labors until far in the night. He and his frugal wife and children live sparingly upon the labor of their own hands. From year to year and from month to month they lay up their little savings and accumulate a little property. Their necessities increase, so that they are compelled to buy articles that are taxed heavily under the tariff and some which are taxed heavily under the internal-revenue laws. This man, toiling along to educate his ten children, which he has done, as a man ought to do, who has gotten them past the school age, if you please, in his old age is to be taxed almost to penury for the purpose of educating the child of some drunken vagabond loafer who never would work for his family and who has left an inheritance of evil and ignorance upon the world.

I am not much in favor of laws that work such results as that. I would rather stand here deserted by every Democrat in the Senate than lend my hand to the persecution of the people, for I believe it is the duty of a Democrat to see that the people are taken care of in all their rights and all their liberties. Equal justice to all men and exclusive privileges to none. That is my creed stated in a very few words.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that his purpose in this measure is to promote the general welfare; that is, that an honest, hard-working man, who is trying to raise or has raised a decent family and who has got something to tax because he has worked, shall be taxed to the extent of the power of the law to supply money to educate the children of the drunken loafer and beat I have been talking about; and Senators call that promoting the general welfare. That is to say, you lift up the bottom man and his progeny by pulling down the man who has honestly worked to get on top. That is the "general welfare."

Society can take care of that sort of general welfare a great deal better than we can. There is not a father of a family in the United States who can not provide for the education of his own children in a way better suited to his condition of life, to the habits and thoughts and duties and destiny of his children, than any member of Congress in the Senate; and there is not an honest father of a family in the United States who does work for his own living who would be willing to give up the education of his children into the hands of any Senator who is here. To take my children and supply the money to educate them to suit yourself is something that neither father nor mother would ever consent to. It violates an instinct of humanity; it violates parental affection; it divorces the children from father and mother both as to influence, as to control, and as to sympathy.

The best families of this continent to-day are those who, in the backwoods of the land, in the fear of God and in respect for the morals and good order of society, have raised around their own hearth-stones honest, sincere, diligent, and faithful sons and daughters. When your great centers of wealth and political power and influence get so corrupt that we wonder the fires of Sodom have not been visited upon them, the country would lose all hope for the future were it not for this fountain of honesty to draw from, which nestles like a benefaction among the woods and the hills and along the streams of this great country. True social power, the honest power, the power of justice, the power of the love of country and the love of God, all that goes to make a people great and strong, is supplied year after year from these humble and unknown sources, where purity and virtue are exalted, and where vice does not dare to intrude with its hideous hoof.

That is the condition of the common people of this country. These are the people to whom I address myself. They understand me and I understand them, and I shall be here, as long as my State gives me the privilege of representing her on this floor, to protect and defend the constitutional rights and liberties of those people, and especially against the tyranny of any usurped power of Congressional taxation.

For the purpose of getting this matter before the Senate in due and proper form, and to understand not merely from my interpretation of the bill, but from the interpretation of it which has been expressed by the committee on two occasions—once two years ago and again the other day—I shall read from the report of the committee, to which there was no dissent, the doctrines which lie at the foundation of this bill; for I want to argue this case not upon any suppositions of my own, not upon any construction that I am capable of putting upon the bill, but upon that interpretation of it which has passed the committee twice, consisting at different times of different membership, and which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire the other day was so in love with that he got up and introduced the entire report and his entire speech of some thirty pages, made before in the Senate, to sustain and illustrate that report. From that report I take the construction upon which I propose to discuss this bill as well as from the text of the bill itself. Now I read from the report:

> But Congress has express power "to provide for the general welfare of the United States," and to exert its utmost power of taxation to promote that which was one of the six greatest ends enumerated in the preamble, and to secure which the Constitution itself was ordained and established by the whole people of the United States of America. That people well understood that without intelligence it would be impossible "to preserve the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity." It goes without argument to say that in no way can the general welfare be so promoted as by the general diffusion of knowledge and the discipline of the mental powers of the masses of the people, which can only be accomplished by common schools maintained by governmental power.
> Governments are but agencies established by society to secure the happiness of its individual members. Whenever they cease to promote the end for which they were created they should be destroyed, and whenever and so far as they fail they should modify or reverse their action.
> If in the past the National Government has not borne its due proportion of the burdens of the education of the people, or if new conditions have arisen which require of it a degree of co-operation with the several States not hitherto necessary in securing to all citizens of the Republic that degree of intelligence which is indispensable to the safety of society and to the happiness of the individual, who is at once the subject and the sovereign in both local and national administration, then the time has come for a new departure, and the withes of straw must yield to the expanding limbs of the giant who is arousing himself for the labors of the time which has already come.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator state where he is reading from?

Mr. MORGAN. I am reading from page 1240 of the RECORD.

Mr. MORGAN. From the right-hand column, at the bottom.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will listen to me for a moment, as he seems to be misled from the failure to read the beginning of the report from which he is quoting, I will state that he is holding the entire committee responsible for matter of argument for which no one but myself is responsible. He will observe at the commencement of the report, which he will find on the top of page 1240 of the first column, what I read now:

> The committee unanimously approve the amount proposed to be appropriated in the bill and its distribution on the basis of illiteracy, and a majority recommend its passage in its present form.
> The matter following is largely from a presentation of the subject made by the chairman of the committee on a former occasion, for which, as matter of argument, the committee as a whole is not responsible, but the statistical tables and calculations having been prepared with considerable labor and care and being substantially unchanged by later information, the same are incorporated with this supplementary report.

I am responsible for this matter of argument which the Senator is quoting. The other members of the committee are no further held than they choose to announce themselves that they are held.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New Hampshire must have understood his own offspring. He is the father of this bill and he understood his child.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. I do not wish to criticise anything in the report, which I have no doubt is a very able report. It was made, however, by the Senator from New Hampshire, and as a member of the committee I have no knowledge of what is contained in the report. We approved the reporting of the bill, but as for the argument which is contained in the report that is the work of the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not know what is contained in it, and therefore I am not bound by what is in it.

Mr. MORGAN. Now I shall expect the honorable Senator from Florida, when I have gotten through and he has a fair opportunity, to get up and state wherein he objects to this doctrine promulgated by the Senator from New Hampshire. I wish to know whether the committee are agreed upon the principle on which the Treasury is to be deprived of $77,000,000, or whether they merely concur in the fact that the money is to be taken out of the Treasury, one for one reason and another for another.

Mr. CALL. I wish to say only that as a member of the committee I have never seen the report. The committee agreed that the bill should be reported favorably, but the report containing the arguments and reasons in support of it has never been submitted to me, and, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, is his work. I do not know what is in the report.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President, there is nothing in the report that is not in the bill, except, perhaps, a little fulmination of rhetoric now and then, and there is nothing in the bill that you could not put into the report, only you would have to enlarge the report a little to accommodate it in all of its results, and in all the evil consequences that may possibly result, and probably will result from its passage.

Here is a committee that bring in a report, or authorize it to be brought in. They send it out to the world; it stays upon the records of the Senate for two years; it is brought in again by the chairman of that same committee and interjected into a speech, and printed in the RECORD, and sent to the world again with no dissenting voice; and now for the first time, when I read the true analysis of this bill from its own author, Senators are found springing up suddenly in every direction to disclaim, "Why, I do not think that about it;" "I do not hold to that doctrine;" "I am not quite content with that form of expression;" "I think I could put it a little better; if I had the sugar-coating of the pill I would have coated it with a different sort of sugar; if I had the explanation of the hideous outrage upon the Constitution that is concealed in the bill I would have covered it up in such a way as that, perhaps, no man's genius would have been able to open the door and let in the light upon it." Here is a committee with a bill of this kind voting $77,000,000, and there is not a member of the committee but one who will rise on the floor of the Senate and say that he ever read the report. Their anxiety to unlock the door of the Treasury and get at $77,000,000 was much greater than their anxiety to understand the reasons upon which the bill is founded.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Alabama will allow me.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask the honorable gentleman from Alabama if he did not vote for a bill to appropriate millions of dollars for the commerce of the country which added so much to taxation?

Mr. MORGAN. No; the Senator can not quite draw me off from the point in hand by that suggestion. That is not my programme of debate, and I have an amendment which I intend to offer, and which I will send to the desk now and have read, for the purpose of showing the Senator where I stand on the difference between dealing with a trust fund and the effect of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 4, after the word "Treasury," it is proposed to insert:

Not otherwise appropriated, and derived from all other sources, except from loans or from the customs-revenue service, or from the internal-revenue service, or from the postal service, or the consular service, or from the Patent Office.

It is further proposed to amend by inserting, at the end of section 1, the following:

And if Congress shall fail to make such appropriation for either of the fiscal years mentioned in this section before such fiscal year begins, said act shall be thereby annulled.

Mr. MORGAN. Now the honorable Senator from Florida will discover, I hope, that in the argument which I propose to make on this bill I intend to be entirely frank and go through any question that is presented in connection with it as well as I can, and that I bring forward and state distinctly the proposition that there is as much difference between applying the property of the United States acquired in the public lands, or acquired otherwise than by taxation, and the taxing of the people directly for money as there is between the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Alabama. They are utterly distinct; and I have offered that amendment for the purpose of getting a vote of the Senate upon it. I have offered it with a view of asking these gentlemen when they come to debate this question, if they care to debate it, and I believe they do, that they shall meet the question flat and square as to the power of Congress to tax the people, and the power of Congress to execute a trust which has been charged into its hands by the votes of the very States themselves.

But I proceed with this interesting document, this report, of which everybody is so ignorant who is on the committee and with which the world is expected to be entirely familiar, this groundwork and basis of this bill. I wish to get more of it before the Senate in order that we can better understand the bill through its author and true interpreter, the Senator from New Hampshire. On page 1248 of the RECORD, containing the Senator's speech, and in that same report which has been twice sent in here from that committee, it is said:

We think it is clear that the nation has the power, which implies the duty of its exercise when necessary, to educate the children who are to become its citizens; and that the urgent demand for its aid at the present time has been demonstrated. We desire to offer a few suggestions in regard to the methods which are, in our judgment, proper to be pursued by the General Government in the present emergency.

The assertion of the committee on that subject appears to be that Congress has the power in order to provide for the emergency to make this appropriation, and the committee think, I suppose, that they can step on that line without committing themselves to the proposition that Congress has the power when no emergency like this exists; in other words, that it is the duty of Congress, as asserted here in the paragraph I have just read, to maintain and support public education; that that is a governmental duty resting upon the Government of the United States and to be exercised through power of laws to be enacted by Congress; that it is a duty which the Government of the United States can only exercise within a State—how? In virtue of the consent of the State? Will Senators say that? Or in virtue of the supremacy accorded to the laws of Congress by the very terms of the Constitution? Will they say that?

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this proposition, which has been too often asserted in the courts and elsewhere to be denied, that Congress can get no power or jurisdiction from the consent of a State. The States have now no power to yield their jurisdiction up to Congress, and Congress can not enhance, enlarge, strengthen, or improve its jurisdiction by concessions made by the States. If Congress never gets any additions to its powers except such as it may borrow from the States, whether for emergency or for perpetual use, the powers of Congress will always remain just what they are, for every State in this Union may, if it pleases, vote through its Legislature to concede to Congress the right to legislate within its borders upon a subject that Congress is prohibited from legislating upon by the Constitution of the United States, and yet Congress would not gain from that consent one particle of power. When you go into a State with a law of Congress you go in virtue of the supremacy of the Government of the United States, and not because you are invited or tolerated or not expelled by the action of the State.

Congress can go nowhere with its laws unless they are supreme. In the Territories, in the States, in the District of Columbia, wherever Congress has the right to enact and enforce a law, that law is supreme; and Senators who feel that they have been educated for a lifetime in the tenets of the Democratic party and in the principles of its great exponents are here to-day imagining that in case of an emergency Congress may borrow power to enter a State and control affairs there from the legislative authority of the State, or else they come to the doctrine announced in this report, that Congress has the right to enforce this bill within the States even if they object. If Congress has the right to enter the States with its power to educate the children there, when it goes there with its laws it goes as a supreme ruler, for its power is not abashed in the presence of the power of any State government when it is exercised in pursuance of and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. If, therefore, Congress can enter the State at all to fix upon one of its officers any rule of law to which he is bound to respond or to impose on him any duty which he must perform, Congress does not go to beg its way through that State by concessions from State authority. It goes in the majesty and in the supremacy of the laws of the United States, and nobody can expel it and nobody can control it. How, then, do you enter these States? By invitation, by consent, by acquiescence on the part of these sovereign powers, or do you enter by force of the power of Congress, granted and guaranteed to it in the Constitution of the United States over all subjects confided to its jurisdiction? Which horn of this dilemma do you take? The honorable Senator from New Hampshire takes this: that Congress has the right to educate the people in the States without their consent.

Mr. BLAIR rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. As the Senator is devoting some attention to constitutional views on this matter, I should like him to represent them, as I have no doubt he desires to do, as nearly as they are stated. Other parts of the report from which he has read elaborate the idea a little more. I would like to observe, if he will not object to the interruption, that the general proposition which I have tried to illustrate or elucidate was to this effect, that education in a free government is absolutely indispensable to its existence; that the National Government is one republican in form, to the existence of which intelligence is as indispensable as it is to the State governments, which are also republican in form and based upon intelligence. I have said that the primary duty of education devolves upon the parent if he is able to give it. The parent failing, either from inability or from lack of desire to educate his child, the duty must devolve upon the State. If the state proper fails as well as the parent to educate the child, which is to become a citizen not alone of the State but of the United States, it then becomes the right of the General Government, in self-defense, to educate that child; but, as I have said in the report, it is a power that never should be exercised except in the last resort.

Whenever the State or the local community is able to sufficiently instruct its youth it should do so, and the national aid should be invoked only when made necessary by local neglect or inability. But this burden is primarily one of taxation. Civilization must be paid for. Education is the insurance upon civilization. It must be kept up everywhere, for the risk is everywhere. To leave the child of the pauper uneducated is to incur as great risk of destruction by the fires or floods of ignorance and crime as if he were the scion of wealth and place.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the Senator reading from his report or his speech?

Mr. BLAIR. I am reading from the report.

Mr. MORGAN. That has been before the Senate three times now. I am getting tired of it; I know what is in it, if the Senator will excuse me——

Mr. BLAIR. Very well. The Senator has been stating what is in it, and I wish he would state it wholly and not partially.

Mr. MORGAN. Now the Senator changes his ground just a little. Congress has power to educate the children in the States provided the States are not able to do it and provided that the parents are not able to do it. He puts the power of Congress to depend on two conditions—one affecting the child and the other the State. A great constitutional power is to be exercised by this Government to depend upon the number of people in a State who are not able to educate their children—the poverty of their parents, the poverty or indifference of the State to educate them, and the ability of the Government of the United States to do it; and he says it is a power that ought not to be exercised except in the last resort. I hope this is the last resort; it is the first one, and I hope it is the last. We have gone on for one hundred years now practically under this perpetual Constitution, and it looks to me as if we had builded very rapidly and very powerfully, and we have had a vast amount of ignorance among us all this time. The Republic seems to be about as sound and as strong as if every man in it had been able to read and write.

But the Senator from New Hampshire does avow the power. In his report he says that it comes from the preamble of the Constitution. He shifts his ground a little now and takes it out of the preamble of the Constitution and puts it, first, upon the condition of poverty of the child's parent; second, the poverty or indifference of the State; third, that thereupon there results a power in Congress to educate him because he must be educated; otherwise the Republic dies. Perhaps that argument would have been a little more emphatic if the Senator had not forgotten in his reading a moment ago to inform the Senate again of the last sentences in this report. He says:

We may postpone the remedy, but the evil will increase. The issue can not be evaded. Common-school education must become universal or the form of our Government must be changed. We believe that the next few years will decide the question.

National aid to schools is indispensable to the national existence; national aid to common schools should be given liberally, given now, and applied where most needed.

This done, the Republic will be perpetual.

It has lived one hundred years without this aid; it has passed through its infancy and its early youth into a pretty broad and strong manhood and got along without national aid to common schools, and I doubt if there is a government in the world that stands fairer or stronger than the Government of the United States. The common schools have contributed much to the prosperity of this country no doubt, but it is a contribution that came up from the people and from the States, from the fathers of families and from neighborhoods, and we have grown into a great and powerful and enlightened people without ever before having had to call upon Congress to aid the common schools.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. I ask him if he denies or admits that Congress has power to make a donation to a State for any purpose whatever?

Mr. MORGAN. I do for some purposes.

Mr. CALL. Do you admit it for any purpose?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not say for any purpose. I might imagine a purpose for which Congress might make a donation to a State.

Mr. CALL. Do you imagine any purpose for which Congress could make a donation to a State without the consent of the State to accept it?

Mr. MORGAN. It would not be much of a donation unless the donee accepted it. It might be called an inchoate gift, subject to be accepted. I recollect a case of that kind when we distributed the proceeds of the surplus revenue in the Treasury. Alabama refused for many years to receive or have anything to do with it. Afterward she took it and put it in her common-school fund.

Mr. CALL. That is precisely the case of this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. The Congress of the United States had no right to give away that money. It had not been collected from the people of the United States for the purpose of being given to the States. I have no right to tax the people of Florida to sustain public institutions in Alabama. If there is a surplus revenue, as there was in 1836, in the Treasury of the United States, no debt to pay, no public works projected, no demand for it of any kind, that does not prove the power of Congress to give that money to the States or to distribute it among them. If you are going to give back that money to anybody, give it to the men who paid it into the Treasury and not to somebody else. I believe that that was a thoroughly unconstitutional law, a law one of the fruits of which is this bill that is before the Senate to-day. You plant an evil weed in the policy of the Government of the United States and let it bear the fruit of a little money and you will be centuries in getting rid of it. This very bill to-day is justified upon that act of 1836, and never was the power of Congress more thoroughly abused than it was in the passage of that act.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Calhoun voted for that bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Ah! I do not know, and I do not, with the greatest possible reverence for Mr. Calhoun, care. Mr. Calhoun has neither got my conscience nor my obligations to comply with now. Mr. Calhoun voted on both sides of many great questions—the national bank, the tariff, internal improvements, various important constitutional questions, and voted his honest opinions every time. If you take one side of these questions you can see him very comfortably as your high authority, and I can take the other side and see him just as comfortably as my high authority, because he voted both ways. It is a delightful thing to have a sort of political ancestor to whose memory every man can refer all his sins and all his transgressions and to quote scriptures, which say the sins of the fathers shall be visited on the children to the eighth, ninth, or tenth generation—whatever generation it is.

Mr. BUTLER. Third and fourth.

Mr. MORGAN. Third and fourth, as my more learned friend says. The sins of the fathers shall be visited on the children to the third and fourth generation, and when you get one of the boys in a tight place on one side of a question he can say, "My father did it," and when you get the other son, who quarrels with him on the other side of the question, in a close place, he can say, "Our father did it." Now, Mr. President, I should hope the honorable Senator from Mississippi could have something better to say in behalf of this bill than to quote Mr. Calhoun on the act of 1836. Why did he not vote that money to common schools?

I have now got, I think, before the Senate the two attitudes of the committee and the honorable chairman. I find them dissevered, unhappy, and disclaiming; I have not been able yet to find out who is the leading counsel in this case, whether it is the chairman of the committee who did the writing and has done most of the speaking for it and has claimed all the honor and glory of passing the bill by giving from the Northern States an immense largess and a most worthy contribution of benevolence to the Southern States, or whether it is the gentlemen from the South who want to receive the money. I do not know who is the leading counsel.

They characterize the bill as a gift to the States. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire characterizes it as a gift to the children. Which is it? There is all the difference. You give it to the State; the State takes it like it did this fund from the surplus revenue distributed in 1836. The State takes it and uses it in building a railroad. The Government can not object. Or it takes it and gives it to the public schools. The Government, the donor, can not object. Or it may do as my State did, put it in a banking system and lose it all, and then create a debt on the people in order to pay interest on the lost fund to the common schools of Alabama. The Government of the United States can not object. That is because the gift is to the State. There is no gift to the State in this bill. There is not even a loan to the State, and the State has nothing to do with this money at all except to provide certain machinery which is subject to revision by Congress and by the Secretary of the Interior for the manner of disbursing it. The gift is to the children in the State, and it is a much more legitimate proposition so far as the power of Congress is concerned, as I take it, than it is to give it to the States. The States stand related to this great Government in a very delicate way, and they by a combination could destroy it or revoke its trusts, but a child could not, or a number of children scattered through the States could not. When you come to dealing with States in regard to the exercise of their sovereign power, you have much more powerful, dangerous antagonists to deal with than you have with any number of school children or their parents. The want of constitutional authority on the part of Congress, however, is equal in either case.

It was not the purpose of the men who ratified the Constitution—the people of the States—to promote the general welfare in any and every way that the imagination or fancy of an optimist or Utopian dreamer might suggest, but by establishing and ordaining a fixed plan, called the Constitution of the United States, to prescribe whatever rights pertained to this Government. All the powers which Congress might exercise were to be according to the plan, and were to be found enumerated in the Constitution, and not to meet a result to be called "the general welfare," not enumerated as a grant of power in the Constitution, or not necessary as a governmental agency in executing the powers expressly conferred.

Congress can only touch the people by laws, and it can only enact laws that relate to some power conferred by the Constitution upon the Government of the United States or some department or officer of the Government, or some power of Congress enumerated in the Constitution.

The committee's report and also this bill reverses the whole theory of the Constitution and the language also, and converts the purposes to be attained in ordaining it into the grant of any power Congress may find it convenient to employ to secure the "general welfare." To illustrate, let us suppose the majority in each House should vote and the President should concur in promoting the "general welfare" by one of the following measures:

To abolish the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the United States.

That would promote the general welfare of "we the people of the United States" beyond question. If Congress may do anything to promote the general welfare because it has power in the preamble of the Constitution, or in its body, to promote the general welfare, as they say, not as I admit, then why can not Congress pass a universal law to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and why does the Senator from New Hampshire come here with bill after bill to amend the Constitution so as to empower Congress to do that, when Congress, in doing it, would do no more than to promote the general welfare, according to his view of it?

Suppose Congress should undertake to establish by law a uniform rule of divorce in all the States. That would "promote the general welfare." Nobody can deny that it would have been a beneficial provision to have put into the original Constitution, along with the power to enact uniform laws of bankruptcy, that the laws of divorce throughout the United States should also be uniform. Such a law would "promote the general welfare" undeniably; and has Congress the power to enact it? I do not believe there is a lawyer on this floor who would say so.

Suppose that Congress in sympathy with the Knights of Labor, or any other great and powerful organization of laboring men, should undertake to pass a law to abolish the penitentiaries in the States where condemned criminals are taught the mechanic arts and are taught to compete with decent men with decent families, would not that "promote the general welfare," or at least the welfare of an immense class of people? And yet does any Senator here believe that Congress has power to abolish the penitentiaries in the States because criminals are taken into them and educated in the arts so as to become competitors with honest men?

Suppose Congress should enact a law to compel artisans to work for lower wages than they get in order that the factories shall not be stopped from running for "the general welfare." Here is an immense aggregation of capital represented on this floor and in the other House, and the capitalists come to Congress and say, "Unless you enact a law to require of mechanics that they shall accept lower wages than they are demanding, at our option, they will compel the closing of the factories of the country and that will disarrange and destroy the general welfare." Could you pass a law of that kind, let me ask? If you can pass this school bill, you can do it.

Or suppose that your law was to compel the owners of factories to pay higher prices so that the operatives and their families shall not starve, would it not be for the general welfare in this country that operatives and their families should not starve and that the iron heel of monopoly should not crush the life out of a laboring man who has nothing else to subsist upon, and would not a law of that kind "promote the general welfare," at least among all that class of people? Unquestionably; yet there is a law to "promote the general welfare" that you would not dare to vote for.

Suppose the law was to provide medicines and surgeons at the common expense to heal the diseases of all the people. If you can take a man's child and educate him and inform his mind; if you find he has a crooked limb or a diseased liver or a head a little out of balance, or is subject to chills, or is liable to fever, can you not call in a doctor at the public expense and put him where he will be treated, furnish him medicines and doctors' fees so as to build up his body, so that there may be a sound mind in a sound body? If you find a mind that is so beset with disease that you can not educate it, the first thing you ought to do is to call in the doctor at the public expense and have him treated so that his body will become sound; then educate his mind; then teach him how to vote, which way to vote, and you have got an American citizen who is prepared to govern and defend the country. Would that not be for the general welfare?

Would it not be a good thing in every community in the United States to establish moral reformatories? The Sisters of Mercy do much to reform people and at large expenses, and it must be for the general welfare that we should establish moral reformatories in the States; yet where is the power to do it? What has Congress to do with establishing a moral reformatory in Alabama any more than it has with an insane asylum, or a deaf and dumb institution, or to work the roads, or to build bridges, or to build jails for us, or market places, or courthouses for the use of the courts of the State?

Suppose you undertake, as a great measure of moral and of physical reform in the country, by act of Congress to punish men who adulterate food and medicines in the States, would not that "promote the general welfare?" In every State of this Union there are men who wickedly and in a criminal way, for profit and gain, adulterate the very food the people eat and adulterate the medicines that they take when languishing upon beds of sickness; yet no man has dared to come into Congress and claim the powers of this body for the purpose of punishing adulterations of food and medicines in the States. It is admitted to be beyond the power of the General Government. What becomes of your "general welfare" doctrine in these cases? You have not got power to keep poisoned food and poisoned medicines out of the mouth of a child; and yet you have power to take him and put him under a schoolmaster and educate him up to the single rule of three in arithmetic. Let us be honest with ourselves. Let us deal candidly with this subject.

Mr. BLAIR rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator what his view is of appropriations for the yellow fever which have been made on several occasions, the yellow fever constituting, I should say, an emergency perhaps no more dangerous than the illiteracy of the country.

Mr. MORGAN. I never believed they were constitutional, if you force me to say it. The fever is past now; the emergency is past. I will say that as to that, and as to tornadoes, and as to inoculation for the small-pox, and for taking cattle that were diseased and shooting them down and paying for them, I have always, if I voted at all, voted against such measures. I did not vote for them. I let them pass. In the name of God and mercy, I blinded my eyes while the Angel of Mercy passed over. You do not find me committed to things of that sort.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not know what the Senator's position might be. Of course he has a right to state it.

Mr. MORGAN. Sometimes for very modest reasons, sometimes because I am a Southern man and therefore a Nazarene in the estimation of some, sometimes because I feel that I should give offense to a sentiment which is merciful and good and just and kind in this body I have not raised my voice to obstruct or to criticise the passage of the measures that I should never have originated and never would have recommended from a committee. Last year I believe it was the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], his heart stirred to its very depths by the fact that a large community there had been rendered absolutely destitute and people destroyed with their houses and farms by a cyclone that passed through, reported a bill from a committee of which he was a member granting relief to those people. My heart almost bled within me when I rose on this floor and objected to it on the ground that we had not the constitutional right to pass it. I do not set myself up in opposition to these bills as they come one by one to relieve against calamitous visitations, because I do not feel called upon every time that I have an opportunity to criticise some measure; but when you come with $77,000,000 taxed out of the people and to be taxed out of them, I feel that it is my duty to express my honest conviction against the constitutional power of Congress to do it.

Suppose your bill should be to vote money to build church edifices, because any decent religion promotes the general welfare, and upon that basis you vote money to build churches in the States. Therefore you would "promote the general welfare" by voting money. Have you got the power? Not to establish religion, not to control it, not to direct it, but merely to give a subvention to it, to these communities who wish to worship God in a decent way and have not the money to build churches. Many such are there, and every Senator here knows it. Particularly does he know how he is appealed to continually by pious men and ladies throughout the whole country to make contributions to the building of churches out of his own private funds.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Alabama will allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator if he has not introduced a bill here and voted for it donating a considerable sum of money to a college or university in Alabama for replacing the buildings which were destroyed during the war?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has got a great many vain imaginations about me, Mr. President. No, I did not. I introduced a bill, voted for it, and carried it too, to apply the public lands, a trust fund in our hands, for that purpose; and I promise the Senator, if he will do me the honor to listen to me when I come to that branch of the subject, to convince him I think that we have power to do that, and in doing it we do not transgress any feature of the Constitution. I remark to him again that the two powers are as different as his individuality is from my bodily existence.

Mr. CALL. I have heard the Senator say so. I want him to prove it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator would like to hear me talk about many things besides those I am just now saying, but I want to keep him and all the rest to the point in hand, for I am not in a debating society now, but I am in the Senate of the United States, and I am stating reasons why I can not vote for this bill. Let us see if Senators can answer them.

Suppose your bill should be to seize the property of the Standard Oil Company because its alleged monopolistic powers and combinations prevent the people from having cheap oil, which promotes the general welfare. Here is a bill "to promote the general welfare" by seizing the property of a great monopoly which makes the room dark where the little boy you are trying to educate can not read his book because his father is not able to pay for the light at the high price the Standard Oil Company demands. That would "promote the general welfare," but what would become of the Standard Oil Company?

Suppose your proposition was to seize all the railroad and telegraph and telephone lines and operate them by the Government because they combine to raise the prices of transportation and so interfere with the general welfare. Have you got the power? Now step forward and assert it. Then you will find antagonists worthy of your steel, then you will find men prepared to test with you in the courts as to whether or not under the clause for promoting the general welfare or conferring, as you say, power to promote the general welfare, you can take the telegraph and telephone and railroad companies and fix rates and freights and take the ownership of them, if you please, out of their hands, so as to "promote the general welfare."

Suppose this Congress should pass a bill to seize the hog crop, or the grain crop, or the cotton, rice, or sugar crop, so as to prevent the gamblers in the exchanges from destroying "the general welfare" by raising the prices of the necessaries of life upon the people of the country, or to buy any of these crops and hold them until we should starve foreign nations into promoting "the general welfare" of our people by paying higher prices for them. If the promotion of the general welfare is included in the powers of Congress, why do you suffer your men to lose so much money upon grain crops shipped abroad, hog crops, beef crops, and all of that, when by interposing the power of this Government with its $300,000,000 of income a year you could buy the crop and hold it in your ownership until you starved foreign people into buying it at our prices?

Or—I am almost afraid to allude to the subject—to promote the general welfare by taxing one class heavily to enrich another more abundantly, thereby giving the taxed millions the benefit of a home market where they can sell without the benefit of foreign competition, or buy without paying the shamefully low prices of foreign markets for goods which they must have, and all for the general welfare. There are some Senators on this floor perhaps who understand the administration of the power of the general welfare in that connection. When they next rise to debate it will they in all honesty and sincerity ask themselves the question whether after all they are faithful apostles of the doctrine that the powers of Congress are to be found in the preamble of the Constitution, and among the enumerations of these powers is the power to "promote the general welfare?"

The "general welfare" is a broad field of power to be covered by a Constitution that was intended "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

Were the blessings of liberty ever secured by giving to a monarch, or to a congress, or a chamber of deputies the power first to determine what shall be considered "the general welfare," and to promote it by such laws as they choose to enact?

It was this doctrine that caused the chamber of deputies to record the fierce decrees of Robespierre, Danton, and Marat on the fair bosom of France in the blood of the innocent men, women, and children of France during the great civil revolution.

Great Britain has been promoting "the general welfare" under the alleged powers of Parliament, "to secure the blessings of liberty" to Englishmen and their posterity, by devastating with confiscations the fairest land in the world, and by starving and degrading the diminishing few who could not escape to a land where liberty is made secure against the powers of the lawmakers by a Constitution that restrains the hand of usurpation by fixed written guarantees.

I could point you to a nearer and to me a dearer land, where the assertion of this power "to promote the general welfare" by securing "the blessings of liberty" to men in violation of its guarantees and express limitations caused the noblest race of men that ever lived to grow anxious, then angry, and then to dispute, and then to divide, man from man, section from section, church from church, State from State, until they stood in armed array, millions opposed to millions, and then to fight until the rich tide of fraternal blood that soaked the earth seemed to intoxicate the continent and made it drunk with the wild frenzy of war.

These brethren of this noble race, whose power in war is made thrice illustrious by their reunited powers in council, are here to-day to discuss and reason and act for the general welfare, and are debating in harmonious council whether they will recognize that there are limits and boundaries in their powers as lawmakers, or whether they will again declare their unrestricted right to decree what will promote the general welfare and to enforce that decree by the enactment of a law.

For my part I feel grateful that I have the opportunity to declare boldly and firmly for the faith handed down from the fathers. Other and far abler men than I am, in the times of trouble through which God has delivered us and our country, men hailing from the South, who are honored in every heart-beat and remembered in every prayer that rises to Heaven, thought themselves fortunate when they had the opportunity to cast away high positions, wealth, and comfort, and to face death in vindication of the doctrine that the liberty guaranteed to American citizens is in fact secured by the limitations of the Constitution upon the powers of Congress.

They sought to defend the rights of their States and people by resisting laws that were enacted outside the Constitution, as they believed and as I believe, and their resistance culminated in armed defiance of usurped power, in death to many, in untold distress to suffering millions, and in subjugation to all.

I am here to refuse by my vote a well-meant benevolence intended to heal some of the wounds that resulted from that great struggle. It is a glittering prize of more than $5,000,000 offered to Alabama for a purpose that will, if accomplished, let in a light brighter than the burnished gold that is offered us upon the darkened mind of many a poor child.

I could not stultify myself by failing to perceive the value of the gift for by underrating the benevolence of many who would tender it to us. I have also the satisfaction of believing that its dispensation at the hands of the Democratic President and Secretary of the Interior would be kindly, faithful, honest, and generous.

If I find myself compelled to vote "no" to this great offer, made under circumstances so auspicious, I will not have the support of great communities to applaud me for defending their rights, as my colleague had when he withdrew from the other House in 1861 to emphasize his love of country and his loyalty to the Constitution. On the contrary, many will reproach me as a pharisee, and many will deeply censure me for practicing a pretentious self-denial at their expense, yet I pray God that I may not falter in my obedience to the Constitution and my interpretation of the oath I have taken to support it. As I understand these, the gift to Alabama and all the other States and Territories that you tender us is not yours to make, nor can it be rightfully ours to enjoy.

What money there is now in the Treasury, being the property of the United States, you may divert or apply to any purpose not forbidden by the Constitution. If the purpose to which you apply it is unwise or unauthorized, still you have the power to so apply it in the exercise of a political power which no judge can call in question. It is needless to argue that in such a case "might does not make right," but it is even more useless to deny that you can melt all the coin in the Treasury into bars and give all the money there in back-pay, increases of salary, and perquisites to yourselves or your friends, and that no judge could restrain you. The very power the legislative department has to violate the law without direct responsibility to the other departments is the one fact above all others that decides me never to exercise a power for which I can find no warrant in the Constitution. As no power can correct our errors, we should be very careful not to commit any.

I regret that I must decide against the apparent interests of Alabama in the vote I shall cast against this bill, but my answer to that enlightened and magnanimous people will be, that I prefer "the spirit of truth, which dieth not, to the body of error, though it were crowned with jewels for its bridal with death."

Five million of dollars is no equivalent for the adoption into our creed of a false principle, which in the end will commit us irrevocably to the will of Congress in the management of our local domestic affairs.

If Congress can create a school in Alabama, and can prescribe the course of study, and define the location of the school-house, and direct how its money shall be expended and accounted for, some for common-school purposes and some for normal and industrial or technical purposes, and can prescribe the contract that a pupil in the normal school shall make to teach a year in the common schools, who can deny its right to build and furnish the school-house, or to employ the teacher, or to require that certain books of history shall be taught, or certain English reading shall not be taught?

Once the power of Congress enters a State, whether by force or by toleration or invitation, as the rightful arbiter of any matter where the law controls the subject, it will never withdraw. The laws of Congress being supreme over the laws of the State, wherever they take any field of legislative jurisdiction under their care, the power of the State, though once sovereign, will dwindle and vanish into thin air. But this measure goes much further. It expressly subordinates the governor and all the State agents engaged in its administration to the requirements of a law of Congress and to direct accountability to Congress through the Secretary of the Interior, and the State itself is to be brought into judgment, and its rights are to be litigated on complaints made to the Secretary of the Interior, and it is to be adjudged delinquent and its rights are to be forfeited by his decree until it has gone off like a reprimanded slave to do its work according to orders.

Now, sir, this bill does all that I have said. It does more. The money is appropriated; it is applied or intended to be applied for the benefit of children of the school age in the respective States; but the State, before it can receive the money, must comply with certain conditions, and so the State, after it has received the money and has expended it, must comply with certain other conditions; and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to these conditions, to see whether, after all, it is Congress that is supreme in the passage of this bill or whether it is the State.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator will allow me a word?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator said the State must comply. Does he mean by that that there is any power reserved by the bill in Congress to enforce compliance on the part of the State? It is simply this, that if the State does not comply it can not have the benefit of the gift.

Mr. MORGAN. That is to say, if the State does not pass an act to receive the gift and does not also pass a law to make its school fund equal to the gift, and if the State does not furnish equal facilities for the education of the children without reference to color in all the schools of the country, or if the State undertakes to do any other thing in opposition to the principle and requirements of this act, the State loses its money.

Mr. GEORGE. And that is all.

Mr. MORGAN. That is enough.

Mr. GEORGE. Congress does not undertake to provide any Federal machinery by which the conditions of the grant shall be enforced as against the State. It only withdraws the gift in case the State will not appropriate the money according to the terms of the gift.

Mr. MORGAN. But the reason Congress does not undertake to provide any Federal machinery for compelling the State to do something under this law is that Congress has no right or power to provide such machinery in any case; none whatever. That is upon the ground that the State is a sovereign, and that it is not subject to Congressional compulsion or coercion.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought the Senator from Alabama undertook to argue upon the idea that this bill destroyed the sovereignty of the State and transferred this whole matter to Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. No; my idea is that this bill does not destroy the State sovereignty; it does not interfere with the State sovereignty; it merely goes into the State with a superior law——

Mr. GEORGE. With the consent of the State.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the consent necessary?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly it is.

Mr. MORGAN. Then the Senator from Mississippi, a great constitutional lawyer, has found out at last that the consent of a State is necessary to confer this power on Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Allow me to reply to that.

Mr. MORGAN. I will, certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not take any position of that sort. I admit that the powers of Congress are to be found in the Federal Constitution, that no consent of a State, except in cases provided in the Constitution—and there is one of that sort and only one—will give Congress any power of jurisdiction in a State. But this bill, as the Senator from Alabama admits, is a pure gift by Congress to the several States.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not admit that.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator to call it a magnificent gift.

Mr. MORGAN. I said that was the hypothesis on this side of the Chamber, not on that.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me explain my position. I say it is a gift, an offer made to the States.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New Hampshire does not insist on that. He says it is a gift to the children.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from New Hampshire is perfectly able to manage his side of the question. I want to manage mine. My position is this——

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me a moment. I have no objection to your managing your side of this case. At the same time you rose to answer a question and to answer a proposition that I had stated. I have given you permission freely and very cordially to do it. But the Senator said that I had admitted that this was a gift to the State. I did not do it. I argued that that is one hypothesis. The other hypothesis was that it was a gift to the child.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me state my position on that subject and that of those gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who advocate the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. It is a pure gift to the State upon conditions subsequent. I will not argue now the right of the State to receive or the right of Congress to make a gift to the States, because that has been settled by precedent from the very beginning of the Government down to the present time, as I showed two years ago when I argued the question. A gift, as was intimated in the question propounded by the Senator from Florida to the Senator from Alabama, can only be made effectual by the consent of the donee, and that is all the force and effect that I attribute to the consent of the State in this matter. Congress can not force a gift upon a State any more than the Senator from Alabama or any other man can force a gift upon another. It takes two to make a gift, one to grant and the other to accept; and that is all the force and effect that I claim or any of us here give to the position that the State must consent, like any other donee must consent, to receive the benefaction.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, I am discussing with a lawyer——

Mr. BLAIR rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Not at present. I am discussing now with a lawyer who has ability, who has learning, who has a discriminating mind, and that honorable Senator says that it requires two to make a gift, the donor and the consenting donee.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true.

Mr. MORGAN. And that being true, there is no power in the Constitution of the United States for the United States Government to send a gift to a State, for there is no power in the Constitution which hints at the idea that Congress may do something with the consent of the State which it can not do without it.

Mr. GEORGE. Can we make a gift to a foreign state?

Mr. MORGAN. I am speaking about the relations between our States and our Government.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to know if Congress can make a gift to a foreign state, as was done during the administration of General Washington?

Mr. MORGAN. With due respect to the honorable Senator that is a begging of the question and a refuge besides.

Mr. GEORGE. If you can make a gift to a foreign state, can you not to your own?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir. If the Senator has not learned enough of horn-book constitutional law to understand the difference between the relations of the Federal Government to a foreign state and of the Federal Government to the States of the Federal Union, I shall have to take back what I said a while ago about his being a profound constitutional lawyer. [Laughter.] No, sir; the Senator saw that he was in a hole, and he could not get out of it without taking refuge in a foreign state.

I repeat the proposition, it does require a donor and a consenting donee to perfect a gift; and inasmuch as there is no hint of power in the Constitution by which an act of Congress is to become complete by the consent of a State, your case is gone.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any hint in the Constitution that any act of Congress shall become complete with the consent of a foreign state or a private individual?

Mr. MORGAN. I have too much respect for the gentleman who taught me the elementary principles of law to answer that question. I really have. I had to go out of my way to answer it a moment ago, but I can not satisfy the Senator. Any little place that he can get into seems to furnish him so much comfort, that after I have driven him out of that position he runs right back into it again. No, sir; there is the whole case given away by the Senator from Mississippi, and every lawyer in this body knows it, I think.

Point to me a place in the Constitution of the United States where it is necessary to get the consent of a State by its Legislature before Congress can act within the State. You can go there and take the census; you can go there and execute the bankrupt law; you can go there and open a court of admiralty; you can go there and establish the original doctrines and powers and principles of equity practiced in the English courts in a State, control its people thereby through the judiciary; you can go there with your Army and without the consent of the State, although they go armed with munitions and ready for war, if you please. All the highways of the State of Alabama are open to the Army of the United States, and General Sheridan can march the Army through there without getting consent of the State, though it may have every appearance of hostility. There is not one instance in the Constitution connected with the exercise of power by Congress where the exercise of that power is made dependent upon the consent of the State; and yet we can not make a gift unless the State consents! The Senator from New Hampshire thinks he can give the money to the children. Probably he can. He can not give it to the State, because the State can not consent to accept it, so as to confer on Congress a power it does not possess to make the gift.

It was very wise that the Congress of the United States was cut off by the Constitution from any such power as that. I will suppose that a very sharply contested Presidential election is going on and that three votes are all that are wanted to carry it, and the Congress of the United States being Democratic goes to a pocket-borough State like some I could name and says to them, "Here, accept from us out of the Treasury of the United States $50,000,000, to be expended by you in the promotion of the general welfare of your people," and they calmly and quietly accept and vote the Democratic ticket. The Government is not only disgraced and scandalized by such a gift, but the Constitution is disrupted, and there is not a fragment of its original integrity left; it is crushed by a gift that Congress makes to a State. No; for God's sake let us never establish the doctrine here that Congress can make a gift out of the Treasury to a State. If you can give for one public purpose you can give for another, and you can compel your Secretary of the Treasury to pay the money out, though that purpose might be as corrupt and as foul as any that ever could have entered into or originated in human mind.

Let us not forget, sir, that our powers are conferred on us by this Constitution to be exercised for the general welfare of the people of this country, and not for the general welfare of the States, considered as States, or of Congress, or of political parties. There are some trusts which have been handed to us in trust by the States themselves, in which the States, as in the case of the public lands, have reserved the beneficial use by the express terms of deeds and charters and compacts. When these come in view we execute the trust and assist the State to do it, or we relinquish our right nominally until the State can go on and execute the trust disembarrassed of our claims.

When you leave that area and come to the proposition of taxing the people at large in the United States to raise $77,000,000 to give in unequal sums to some of the States, can you not by an act of Congress give the whole amount of money to one State as well as to thirty-eight States and ten Territories? What do you base the gift upon? What is your excuse for the gift? The condition of the people? They are poor; they are impoverished by war; they are filled through the act of Congress with a large voting population, a large community who were recently slaves; and you say that in commiseration of their condition you will make them a gift of a much larger proportion of $77,000,000 than is to be received by the States of the North.

You come with alms and beg the State to take it, or else, as the honorable Senator from Kansas, I believe it was, suggested to me once, you come with a bribe and ask us to take it. You either come in the name of sweet charity or you come in the name of Pluto, one of the two. As an Alabamian I most respectfully bow my dissent to the overture. Come as it may, I can not take it. If I was in the Legislature of Alabama I would vote to refuse to receive it, lest thereby I might establish a precedent which some other power might employ in some way for the ruin and destruction of the whole country.

What is your governor doing here before the Secretary of the Interior? I see, as I read this bill, the gallant and honorable gentleman who represents my State in that office with so much distinction coming under the twelfth section and he says: "Mr. Secretary of the Interior, I have the honor to say to you that under the twelfth section of an act of Congress, passed on such a day, I am here for the purpose of reporting the condition of my State, its legislation and its school fund, and of trying to convince you that a certain sum of money, amounting to $400,000, which was drawn out of the Treasury of the United States under this act of Congress, has been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by the act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, and I do this in order that I may get for Alabama, during the next year, the benefit of this act of Congress."

The 1,250,000 people in Alabama who are taxed along with the rest of the people of the United States, and who in the last four years, without the assistance of a school bill, have raised their wealth $28,000,000, as shown by their assessments and their tax-books, are a tax-paying people. They consume a great deal that is imported into this country under the customs laws; they use quite an amount of whisky under the revenue laws. They use a good deal of tobacco, which is also taxed under the revenue laws. They are large contributors to the Treasury of the United States out of tariff taxation, and they are growing at the rate of $7,000,000 a year in the taxable values of their property, for in four years they have increased twenty-eight millions. They have paid money into the Treasury of the United States along with the rest of the people of the United States, and I am here for the purpose of convincing you that we have complied with all the requirements and provisions of this act of Congress.

Here is the governor before the Secretary of the Interior. He might as well be on his knees so far as the humiliation of his position is concerned. Here comes some person under the eleventh section of the act and says: "Mr. Secretary, I am a school-master down there in Alabama. I am a very good one. I have a good education, good moral character, but the people in the neighborhood where I was did not like me; I had some curious notions about religion. The school is non-sectarian; I am an agnostic. But I was a better teacher than the man they employed and would have done more good to the children, but they would not employ me; they discriminated against me on account of my religious belief, or because I did not have any." The Secretary turns to this act and he sees this:

> The Secretary of the Interior shall have power to hear and examine any complaints of misappropriation or unjust discrimination in the use of the funds herein provided, and shall report to Congress the results thereof.

He is hearing what he has jurisdiction to hear. He is about to decide in favor of or against the State in regard to the next year's appropriation under this act, upon complaint made to him as to whether the whole law through the entire State has been faithfully complied with without discrimination, and that there has been no misappropriation of funds by anybody. What is your State doing? Where is the authority of that State when her governor is here explaining to the Secretary of the Interior about the management of domestic affairs within his own territory? Where is the power of that beautiful column that sustains with a strength, which I trust may be everlasting, the great dome of this beautiful temple of liberty while the governor, who represents the strength and majesty of the State, is here answering to some schoolmaster—he may be a black one or he may be a white one—as to whether he was excluded on account of color from becoming a teacher in a public school in the State of Alabama? That is the grand controversy which this bill authorizes any school-teacher or any pupil in any school to come to Washington and prefer against the State. Is this all a trap, whose power is not to be controlled even by the judiciary, to decide against the State? The State may according to his decision stay out in the cold twelve months and the people may keep on paying taxes.

Mr. GEORGE. I think there is a provision in the bill that allows separate schools to be kept up for the colored race.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not debating the question about whether the children are to be kept apart, the blacks and whites. This bill does provide for that, but I am debating the question of your not having the right to discriminate on account of color in regard to the teacher.

I will put the case in this way in order that the Senator from Mississippi can understand it very clearly. Here comes a colored teacher who has been educated at Howard University. He is an accomplished man; of good morals. He has gone through a very select course, an eclectic course in that university, and is entirely competent to teach a common school. He goes to Alabama on the mountain-top; I will say he goes to the county of Walker or the county of Jefferson, where there is not one colored man or woman to every 6,000 population in some places, and he says to the superintendent: "Sir, I am a candidate here to be appointed as school-master. This law brings the money, one-half of it, from Congress. I have been a ward of the United States, and I do not know but that I am one yet, holding that delicate relation to the people of the United States and the Congress. I am an accomplished man; here is my diploma. I am a Christian man; here is my certificate of church membership. I am a total abstinence man; I am a public morality man in every way; and I am here well calculated to promote the general welfare, and I propose now to teach your children."

Here comes a young man just educated out of a country school without any knowledge of teaching at all, a man of good standing but an ignoramus so far as teaching school is concerned. He says, "I can read, write, and cipher, know a good deal about the history of the United States, a good deal about geography; and that is all that is required to teach any one of these schools. I propose now that you shall elect me instead of this colored man." They elect the white man. The colored man comes back to the Secretary of the Interior and makes that sort of a case. Would it not be too obvious for discussion that under the very provisions of this bill that man had been excluded in violation of it because of his color or race?

Mr. BLAIR. I am not quite sure that I understand the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I was not talking about the Senator from New Hampshire. I was talking about the colored race.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that the Senator claims that this bill establishes some discrimination on the ground of color or prohibits any discrimination on account of color in the employment of teachers.

Mr. MORGAN. I should say it prohibits it.

Mr. BLAIR. Does he say that it has any provision whatever bearing on color in connection with the teachers of schools?

Mr. MORGAN. I so understand it.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like the Senator to point out what he has reference to.

Mr. MORGAN. I so understand it.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that there are any provisions against discrimination on account of color except such as apply to the children, those who are to be educated. There is a provision that a certain part of the money may be applied for the education of teachers without reference to color to affect the qualifications of teachers who may be without the means of qualifying themselves, whether white or colored teachers.

Mr. MORGAN. I will read the fifteenth section:

SEC. 15. That no State or Territory that does not distribute the moneys raised for common-school purposes equally for the education of all the children, without distinction of race or color, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this act.

There is a prohibition expressed.

Mr. BLAIR. That applies to the education of children.

Mr. MORGAN. That is not permissive legislation; it is prohibitory.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator was enlarging in regard to teachers. That applies to children.

Mr. MORGAN. "That a part of the money apportioned to each State"——

Mr. BLAIR. What section is the Senator reading?

Mr. MORGAN. Section 8.

That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools, or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to competent and suitable persons, of any color, who are without necessary means to qualify themselves for teaching, and who shall agree in writing to devote themselves exclusively, for at least one year after leaving such training schools, to teach in the common schools, for such compensation as may be paid other teachers therein.

I will strengthen my case a little by adding to the supposition I have just made the fact that the person who applies, a colored man who applies to teach in one of these schools, has given his contract to the State, made his bond agreeing that he will teach for a year. That is a mutual obligation. The State has got a place for him and he is a fit man, he has the right to suppose and believe. He says, "I have the right to teach;" but if they should say, "My dear sir, that is all very well, but we have nothing but a white school to put you over; there is no vacancy anywhere else, and we can not give it to you because of your color; you have got the contract; you have complied with it; you have the education; you are here applying for the berth of teacher, and this statute in this very part of it says that there shall be no discrimination on account of color, yet when you come to comply with your contract we quietly say to you you are a negro, and we can not employ you to teach in a white school."

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator claim that the bill provides that there shall be no discrimination on the ground of color so far as teachers are concerned?

Mr. MORGAN. I have just read it.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator did not read anything that had the effect he gives to it.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not expect to convince the honorable Senator from New Hampshire or the honorable Senator from Mississippi of anything.

Mr. BLAIR. You can do it very easily if you are stating the truth.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not speaking really to this audience. I am speaking to the people at home.

Mr. GEORGE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. If a colored school equally valuable as to salary was assigned to this gentleman, would the contract on the part of the State be fully complied with?

Mr. MORGAN. But suppose you had no colored school and there was no vacancy?

Mr. GEORGE. There are plenty of them in the Southern States.

Mr. MORGAN. That does not answer the question of law. I am discussing the question of law in this case upon a supposed state of facts which are consistent with the bill. Now the honorable Senator meets that by saying that there are a great many more colored schools in Mississippi than white, or as many, and therefore the negro would have a better chance.

Mr. GEORGE. As good a one.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, as good a one. I am trying to find out how far you are controlling the powers of the States in all this matter. I would very much rather vote for the bill if it had said that there should be only white teachers for whites and blacks both. That would suit me better. I have no squeamishness about that. I believe a white man or a white woman is much more competent to teach a white or a colored child than any negro, as a rule. That does not alter the principle of law in this bill, and I am trying to find out what is in it.

Now, I will suppose that a man in the condition I have just mentioned comes before the Secretary of the Interior and complains of the governor of Alabama. He hauls him up for trial and says, "Here is a case of discrimination; here is a case of discrimination against the law you yourselves have enacted." I want to know what you are going to do about it. This bill provides that if there is any discrimination, any whatever, the people of the State of Alabama for that act shall lose all the moneys coming to them the next year, but they shall keep on paying the taxes. There is the condition we are in.

I want to read a decision from the Supreme Court of the United States upon this question, a brief extract from an utterance of Chief-Justice Marshall in the great case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, which I think puts this question upon very clear ground.

On this ground—

the counsel for the bank place its claim to be exempted from the power of a State to tax its operations. There is no express provision for the case; but the claim has been sustained on a principle which so entirely pervades the Constitution, is so intermixed with the materials which compose it, so interwoven with its web, so blended with its texture, as to be incapable of being separated from it without rending it into shreds.

This great principle is, that the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme; that they control the constitution and laws of the respective States, and can not be controlled by them. From this, which may be almost termed an axiom, other propositions are deduced as corollaries, on the truth or error of which, and on their application to this case, the cause has been supposed to depend. These are: 1. That a power to create implies a power to preserve. 2. That a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to, and incompatible with, these powers to create and to preserve. 3. That where this repugnancy exists, that authority which is supreme must control, not yield, to that over which it is supreme.

These propositions, as abstract truths, would perhaps never be controverted. (McCulloch vs. State of Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 316.)

Here comes the governor of Alabama, and here comes the informant, and they both go before the Secretary of the Interior. He hears the case, and he decides that the laws of the United States, being supreme, must prevail in the administration of this fund. He agrees with Chief-Justice Marshal in that great and beautiful utterance which I have just had the honor of reading to the Senate, and what is the result? The Secretary says, "You have violated the supreme law; your State has violated the supreme law; the officers of your State have violated the supreme law in discriminating against this man on account of color, or in misapplying the fund, or in misdistributing the fund. Under the circumstances the State officers, the State law must go down, the people must continue to pay taxes to the Government of the United States." While all other States are drawing their percentage of distribution the State of Alabama must stand out in the cold, and all that is the result of the assumption of a power on the part of the Congress of the United States which is wholly unconstitutional.

Mr. HARRIS. Would it be agreeable to the Senator from Alabama to yield to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business at this point in his address?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me to state one more proposition and place it briefly upon record I will yield.

Sir, I have not yet touched the most important difficulty I find in giving my support to this measure. I refer to the great and startling abuse of the taxing power in this bill. Before I speak upon this point more fully I will read from a decision of the Supreme Court, the Loan Association vs. Topeka, the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller:

> The theory of our governments, State and national, is opposed to the deposit of unlimited power anywhere. The executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches of these governments are all of limited and defined powers.
> There are limitations on such power which grow out of the essential nature of all free governments—implied reservations of individual rights, without which the social compact could not exist, and which are respected by all governments entitled to the name. No court, for instance, would hesitate to declare void a statute which enacted that A and B, who were husband and wife to each other, should be so no longer, but that A should thereafter be the husband of C and B the wife of D, or which should enact that the homestead now owned by A should no longer be his, but should henceforth be the property of B.
> Of all the powers conferred upon government that of taxation is most liable to abuse. Given a purpose or object for which taxation may be lawfully used, and the extent of its exercise is in its very nature unlimited. It is true that express limitation on the amount of tax to be levied or the things to be taxed may be imposed by constitution or statute, but in most instances for which taxes are levied, as the support of government, the prosecution of war, the national defense, any limitation is unsafe. The entire resources of the people should, in some instances, be at the disposal of the government.
> The power to tax is, therefore, the strongest, the most pervading of all the powers of government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people. It was said by Chief-Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax is the power to destroy. A striking instance of the truth of the proposition is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the United States on the circulation of all other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year or two after its passage. This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.
> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms. (20 Wallace's Supreme Court Reports, 662, 664.)

That ought to be enough in the way of a declaration as to the danger of this power which I think this bill so grossly abuses. My great and leading objection to it is that this bill rests entirely upon the taxing power of the Government to be exercised in the future. It does not take a sum of money that is in the Treasury of the United States now and appropriate it. We have got surplus money enough in the Treasury just about to pay this bill. Why not set it aside then as it is, there lay our hands upon it, instead of letting that be passed out into public expenditures and then resorting to the taxing power to raise money out of the people to be hereafter expended for public schools?

If you would put in this bill that this money is to be raised out of the taxation of the people for the express purpose of maintaining common schools in the States, or, if you please, to add to it, by the consent of the States, you would have a bill which on its face would be so unconstitutional that I doubt if any court in the country could be found to aid in its execution, even though the tax-payers consented. Now, Mr. President, I will yield.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I do not mean to yield the floor, but I was asked to give way for an executive session.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood the Senator from Alabama to yield to a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the motion?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to that motion.

Mr. HOAR. I inquire of the Senator from Alabama if he would not be willing to give way to a motion to rescind the vote for an adjournment to Monday, so that we can have his argument connected to-morrow?

Mr. MORGAN. I am much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts; but my engagements in committees to-morrow are quite as important as those of any other Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed——

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the Senator to yield to me a moment.

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. BLAIR. Of course if it is desirable to have an executive session it is too late for me to ask the Senate to give further attention to this bill to-night; but I wish to give notice that next Monday, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business proper, at that point when the consideration of the Calendar shall be in order, I shall ask the Senate to take up this bill and proceed with it until 2 o'clock, when, as the unfinished business, it will have the right of way under the rules.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator to allow me to offer an order——

Mr. HARRIS. I yield for an order.

REPORT ON ORDNANCE AND WAR SHIPS.

Mr. HAWLEY. In behalf of the Committee on Printing I report a concurrent resolution with an amendment in the form of a substitute. There are three or four small changes made, and it is better to have a substitute than bother with the small details of amendments.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HAWLEY on the 8th instant:

> Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 8,000 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships be printed; 1,000 copies each for the War and Navy Departments, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The amendment of the Joint Committee on Printing was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

> That 11,100 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships be printed; 100 copies for the use of the committee to be distributed to those who contributed to the appendix of said report, 1,000 copies each for the War and Navy Departments, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Berry,	Gorman,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blackburn,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Sherman,
Call,	Harris,	Morgan,	Spooner,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Payne,	Walthall,
George,	Jackson,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa,
Gibson,	Jones of Arkansas,	Ransom,	Wilson of Md.

NAYS—12.

Blair,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	Platt,
Conger,	Frye,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,
Cullom,	Hale,	Palmer,	Teller.

ABSENT—36.

Aldrich,	Coke,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,
Allison,	Dawes,	Kenna,	Pugh,
Beck,	Dolph,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Eustis,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Brown,	Evarts,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Fair,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Camden,	Gray,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck,
Cameron,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vest,
Chace,	Jones of Florida,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Voorhees.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order until the order is executed for closing the doors.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will wait.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS.

Received the 11th day of February, 1886.

UNITED STATES ASSISTANT TREASURER.

Wayland W. Sutton, of Ohio, to be assistant treasurer of the United States at Cincinnati, Ohio, vice Leopold Markbrier, commission expired.

POSTMASTERS.

Joseph S. McCartney, to be postmaster at Garnett, Anderson County, Kansas, vice Solomon Kauffman, resigned.

Franklin A. Thompson, to be postmaster at McCook, Red Cloud

County, Nebraska, vice Alonzo P. Sharp, whose removal for cause is hereby proposed.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate February 11, 1886.

INDIAN AGENT.

Peter Gallagher, of Wytheville, Va., to be agent for the Indians of Fort Hall agency, in Idaho.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 11, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FEDERATION OF TRADES, ETC.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent to present at this time for reference, with the request that it be printed in the RECORD, the memorial of W. H. Parsons, on behalf of the Federation of Trades and Knights of Labor, Baltimore, Md., and member of the national committee for Maryland, on behalf of the National Bimetallic Association of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to present a memorial and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

DEBATE ON FITZ-JOHN PORTER BILL.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special order of the House of Friday, February 5, be modified so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 11th day of February, immediately after the second call of committees under clause 5, Rule XXIV, be set apart for the consideration of House bill No. 67 for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and that the consideration of the same be resumed at the same time thereafter on Saturday, and Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, and that the previous question be moved Thursday, 18th February, at 3 o'clock p. m., and that a recess be taken Tuesday, February 16, from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7 p. m. on that day, and that the evening session be devoted to the consideration of said House bill No. 67.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to say I think that was the intention of the House in adopting the original resolution. It makes the morning hour what we all understood it to be when that resolution was adopted; that is, the second hour. It makes this debate come in after the second hour, the morning hour for the consideration of bills. But under our rules the technical morning hour is the first one; and it is to clear up that difficulty that I offer this resolution, which I hope will be adopted.

Mr. BRAGG. Without referring to the construction that may be put upon our new rules, there is a matter to which I would desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine, whether, after the previous question is ordered, the person selected to close the debate shall have his hour, or whether the order fixing 3 o'clock on Thursday for the close of the debate will deprive the person closing the debate of the right to the floor for an hour after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I suppose—I of course can not give an authoritative interpretation of the rules—but I suppose, under our rules, the member selected to close the debate would have his hour after the previous question was ordered.

Mr. BRAGG. All I desire is that the effect of the resolution shall be so considered by the House.

The SPEAKER. It may be so understood if there is no objection.

Mr. MORRISON. I think we can have no understanding as to that. The rules must stand as they are.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I think there should be no objection to this modification of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the resolution will be reported again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the resolution simply so modifies the original resolution as to provide that the consideration of the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter shall begin after the hour for consideration of bills and not before it. It makes no other change.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Maine consent to make the further modification that the vote shall be taken on Tuesday instead of Thursday next?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not ask me to do that. I think we can all agree to this modification as it stands in the resolution, and that it goes as far as is possible in the gentleman's direction.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that four days for the consideration of this bill is a pretty long time.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the resolution as it stands will leave only a fair period for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the resolution open to amendment?

Mr. REED, of Maine. I ask for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. If it be open to amendment I will move to strike out Thursday and insert Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has asked the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish the sense of the House tested upon that proposition, and I shall ask the test on the vote ordering the previous question, with the notice that if the previous question is not ordered then I shall move to amend the resolution so as to make the debate close on Tuesday instead of Thursday, and shall ask for the previous question immediately thereafter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know if the resolution before the House has the approval of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG].

Mr. REED, of Maine. I consulted that gentleman before I presented the proposition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If this resolution is to be adopted, is it understood, or is it contained in the resolution itself, that while this debate is in progress there will be no other business done in the House?

The SPEAKER. The resolution sets apart the days named, and on those days after the second call of committees no other business can be transacted except by consent of the House.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question, there were—ayes 68, noes 49.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. REED, of Maine. This resolution should not be taken advantage of to reduce the time for debate. This is the right thing.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the call for tellers. I do this at the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG].

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill granting a pension to the widow of Major-General Hancock.

The SPEAKER. The title will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

Mr. BEACH. Before the title is read, Mr. Speaker, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] objects.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLBORN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to have printed for the use of the Committee on Military Affairs the appropriation bills for the support of the Army and of the Military Academy, and also certain memorials pending before that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that a resolution has been already passed by the House authorizing the committee having jurisdiction over appropriation bills to have those bills printed.

Mr. BRAGG. Very well.

SECTION 304 REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 4875, a bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS, INDIAN TERRITORY.

House bill No. 4875 was, by unanimous consent, laid on the table.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 3211 and 5123, a bill (H. R. 5545) conferring civil jurisdiction in certain cases arising in the Indian Territory on the United States courts which now or may hereafter exercise criminal jurisdiction over said Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

By unanimous consent, House bills Nos. 3211 and 5123 were laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF UNITED STATES LAWS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 679) to extend the laws of the United States over certain unorganized Territories south of the State of Kansas; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now, under the rule, call the committees for the consideration of bills for one hour, which begins at ten minutes to 1 o'clock.

NATIONAL-BANK ASSOCIATIONS.

The Committee on Banking and Currency was called.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to call up from the House Calendar for consideration the bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names or locations.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any national banking association may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, by the vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of such association, increase its capital stock, in accordance with existing laws, to any sum approved by the said Comptroller, notwithstanding the limit fixed in its original articles of association and determined by said Comptroller; and no increase of the capital stock of any national banking association either within or beyond the limit fixed in its original articles of association shall be made except in the manner herein provided.

SEC. 2. That any national banking association may change its name or the place where its operations of discount and deposit are to be carried on, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, by the vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of such association. A duly authenticated notice of the vote and of the new name or location selected shall be sent to the office of the Comptroller of the Currency; but no change of name or location shall be valid until the Comptroller shall have issued his certificate of approval of the same.

SEC. 3. That all debts, liabilities, rights, provisions, and powers of the association under its old name shall devolve upon and inure to the association under its new name.

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release any national banking association under its old name or at its old location from any liability, or affect any action or proceeding in law in which said association may be or become a party or interested.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to inquire of the Chair if I have the right to call for the reading of the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The report can be read as part of the gentleman's remarks. The time occupied in reading it will be considered as a part of the hour.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I ask that the report be read as a part of my remarks.

The report (by Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names or locations, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

Numerous private bills have been introduced into the last and into the present Congress to change the names or locations of individual banks, or to increase their capital stock beyond the limits originally fixed in their articles of association. Each of these private bills occupies the time and burdens the calendars of committees and of the House. There is no reason why applications for such changes by individual banks should not be disposed of by the Comptroller of the Currency under conditions established by law. The committee believe that the only conditions that need be established are—

First. That the owners of two-thirds of the stock shall consent to the proposed change of name, location, or amount of capital stock.

Second. That due notice of the change shall be given to the public.

These conditions are established by the bill under consideration.

The bill makes one further change in existing law. Within the limits fixed in the articles of association the capital stock of a bank can now be increased without the assent of the stockholders. This bill provides that such a change should also be subjected to the condition that the owners of two-thirds of the stock shall assent thereto.

The committee report the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I have here a list, which I think is not complete, of private bills introduced into this House at this session for this special purpose. One comes from Indiana, two from Minnesota, one from Wisconsin, one from Pennsylvania, one from Ohio, and one from Arkansas. It will occur to the House that applications of this kind must naturally come from those parts of the country where population is rapidly changing or business is rapidly developing. The committee believe that under conditions established by law these changes should be made by the Comptroller of the Currency without burdening the Calendars of the House. On the first part of the bill I shall say no more than that until I hear some objection.

In regard to the provision in the last part of the bill, I will say that under existing law a bank may have articles of association fixing its capital stock at, say, $200,000, and yet may provide by a resolution which perhaps few subscribers to the stock are aware of that the capital may be increased to a million of dollars; and when the articles of association contain such a provision the directors, without consulting the shareholders at all, can go to the Comptroller of the Currency and secure an increase of the capital stock. The committee believe that that is too large a power to be vested in the directors, and therefore they require that any such application shall also have the assent of the owners of two-thirds of the stock.

I do not care, Mr. Speaker, to argue the question further until I hear some objection. I am ready to answer any questions, and I am ready to yield to any gentleman a limited portion of time to discuss the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a word?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. For how long?

Mr. SPRINGER. Only two or three minutes.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not see any necessity for discussing this bill at all. It is simply a general law authorizing, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, any national bank to change its name or location or to increase its capital stock, with the consent of the owners of two-thirds of the stock. This bill seems so eminently fair and just that I can not conceive of any opposition to it, and I do not see any necessity for discussing it further. I hope it will pass without unnecessary delay. It is in the right direction. It is providing a general law for doing what Congress has always done when the parties interested have come and asked a special law for that purpose. And I hope we will begin right here this work of establishing general laws which will remove all special legislation from Congress. This bill being in the right direction, I hope it will pass.

Mr. BEACH. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from New York five minutes.

Mr. BEACH. I do not rise to oppose the bill. On the contrary, I am heartily in favor of the object it seeks to accomplish. This is a general bill giving the Comptroller of the Currency power to do a few administrative acts which heretofore have devolved on Congress. It is intended to stop the presentation of a large number of private bills which heretofore have found their way to our Calendars, and which, when reached, are passed as a matter of course.

I look upon this therefore as a step in the right direction. The sooner we pass more general laws like this the sooner we will rid ourselves of all this special legislation and leave time for the consideration of more weighty and important matters. But, Mr. Speaker, while I do not oppose the object of this bill, I desire to criticise, and very briefly, its verbal construction; and what I may say upon this point is equally pertinent to a large number of bills passed by this House.

The sole object of this bill is to give the Comptroller of the Currency power to change the names or locations of national banks or to increase their capital stock. Why not say so, then, in so many words? Why all this senseless verbiage spread over twenty-seven lines when four lines would answer every purpose. Why, sir, this bill as reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency reminds me of an old time indictment with all its iteration and reiteration, its repetition and multiplicity of words. Let us look at the bill for a moment. Let me read the first section:

That any national banking association may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, by the vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of such association, increase its capital stock in accordance with existing laws—

"In accordance with existing laws"—it certainly could not do it in violation of existing laws, nor could it do it in accordance with nonexisting laws—"to any sum approved by the said Comptroller, notwithstanding the limit fixed in its original articles of association and determined by said Comptroller"—if it increased its capital stock it would most assuredly do it, "notwithstanding the limits fixed in its articles of association."

Having thus provided for the manner in which the increase shall be made, the section proceeds:

And no increase of the capital stock of any national banking association, either within or beyond the limit fixed in its original articles of association, shall be made except in the manner herein provided.

Of course not. How could it be made in any other manner? The first five lines of the section say how the increase shall be made and the last five lines say that it shall not be made in any other manner. What is the use of these last five lines? Why may they not be stricken out?

Section 2 of the bill provides:

That any national banking association may change its name or the place where its operations of discount and deposit are to be carried on.

What is the need of all these words? Why not simply say "location," so that it will read "any national banking association may change its name or location?" The section proceeds:

With the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, by the vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of such association, a duly authenticated notice of the vote and of the new name, &c.

Why does not the bill proceed to prescribe that this notice shall be on white note paper, so many pounds to the ream, with a certain margin, and duly certified by a notary public and authenticated by the county clerk. It then goes on to provide:

But no change of name or location shall be valid until the Comptroller shall have issued his certificate of approval of the same.

How could it be valid under the preceding provisions of the bill until it had received the approval of the Comptroller? The previous words of the section require that his approval shall be obtained, yet the latter part of the section goes on to provide that no change shall be valid until his approval is obtained!

Look at section 3. It provides—

That all debts, liabilities, rights, provisions, and powers of the association under its old name shall devolve upon and inure to the association under its new name.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois in charge of this bill [Mr. ADAMS] what earthly use there is in that provision. Every lawyer on this floor knows that the mere act of changing the location or name of a bank or increasing its capital stock does not impair the existing rights of creditors or deprive the bank of any of its powers. Therefore what is the use of this provision?

Section 4 provides that—

Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release any national banking association under its old name or at its old location from any liability, or affect any action or proceeding in law in which said association may be or become a party interested.

That is simply a repetition of the third section, which, as I have already shown, is entirely unnecessary. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to lumbering up the statute-books with such a mass of verbiage as we find in this bill and in many other bills presented here.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] whether he thinks those provisions actually do any harm.

Mr. BEACH. Cui bono? What good do they do? They simply lumber up the statute-books. There is no use in them, and for that reason I am opposed to them. Mr. Speaker, let us drop all this "to the contrary notwithstanding" business, and enact a plain, simple law which the people can understand, and over which lawyers can not wrangle. Such a bill I introduced in the last Congress, and here I may say it was the pioneer bill on this subject, and I have renewed it in this, and I now send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read as part of my remarks:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to change the name or location of any national bank, or to increase the capital stock thereof, upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe for the protection of the public interests, provided that no such change or increase shall be made without the consent of two-thirds of the shareholders of such bank.

Mr. BEACH. Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill just read is plain Anglo-Saxon and says just what it means.

Mr. MILLER. I rise to a point of order, that the bill just read is not in order as an amendment, as it is a bill pending before the House.

Mr. BEACH. I have not offered it as an amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman offers it as a sample of Jeffersonian simplicity.

Mr. BEACH. It says just exactly what it means. There is no ambiguity about it, no repetition or multiplicity of words. It accomplishes in five lines what the bill now before the House undertakes to accomplish in twenty-seven. It goes straight to the business in hand. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will offer this as a substitute for the word-ridden bill presented by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that in the time of the gentleman from Illinois without his consent.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to state a few facts myself, and then I will determine about yielding my time.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, whether the gentleman from Illinois having charge of this bill has control of all the time, so that those opposed to the bill can not be recognized except in his time.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule of the House the gentleman is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And after that——

The SPEAKER. After that any gentleman who obtains the floor will have a right to speak.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the principal provisions of the bill, the language of which has been criticised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH], came from an ex-Comptroller of the Currency of the United States. Sections 3 and 4, which the gentleman has criticised as useless, were added out of abundant caution. I myself agree that the identity of a corporation would be established by the law without these precise statements on the statute-book, but I have often advised a client when making up a land title that his purpose should be not merely to get a title which would stand criticism in court, but a title so clear that no captious lawyer could ever imagine the possibility of taking it into court at all. Therefore I think that provisions like these, although they may be offensive to the strict taste of the gentleman from New York, do not "lumber up the statute-book" sufficiently to render it expedient to strike them out.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Am I correct in understanding the present law to provide that a national bank can only issue circulation to a given proportion of its capital stock?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That I understand to be the fact; but I can not state the proportion without referring to the book.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is immaterial at present. This bill, then, by a general provision places it in the power of the national banks to increase their capital stock as they see fit, or does it make the $5,000,000 limitation?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then this bill, if it should become a law, would give to the national banks the power to increase their capital stock to the extent of $5,000,000. Of course that would carry with it the power to increase the issuance of national-bank notes, would it not?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. So that it would carry with it the power to inflate the currency up to the limit of the $5,000,000 that might be reached by each one of the national banks?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Yes; if any bank found it profitable to do so. But it is a fact that some of our large banks do not issue circulation, because they do not find it profitable.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Now, will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to occupy some little time, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I will first yield to the gentleman from Kansas for five minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. In so far as this bill proposes by general enactment to take from the House the burden of passing special acts, it strikes me as being good. Yet, so far as the banks are concerned, should this bill become a law, they would be freed from the supervision which is now maintained over them to the extent that they can not increase their capital stock without a special act. This would be the first great gain to the banks by the passage of this bill. It is true it would benefit us in the transaction of business; and that consideration has been strongly presented to us. But it is also true that each one of the many hundreds—I do not know how many—of national banks in the country will, by the passage of this act, obtain an advantage which they do not now have. In other words, they can instantly at their own pleasure increase their capital stock four, six, eight, ten, or fifteen times what it now is.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And hence their currency, too.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Now, that brings us to another point. If they can obtain this advantage in being freed from the supervision of Congress, in being freed from the necessity of obtaining special authority for the increase of their capital stock, they can en masse increase their issue of national-bank notes. In this view, it seems to me this bill carries with it a power which should for a moment at least challenge the attention of this House. We have the silver question under discussion; we have the movement of the "gold-bugs," persistent and perpetual, to depreciate silver. Now you come with this bill giving to the national banks the power to increase their circulation, no man can tell how much, and it is all done under the guise of taking from the House the burden of considering local bills.

It seems to me that it is at least worth while for gentlemen who are interested in the financial question—for gentlemen who see the effect of an abundance or scarcity of money upon the prosperity of the country—for gentlemen who see the amount of power that is to-day consolidated in the national banks—it is at least worth while for those gentlemen to determine whether on a very brief discussion they are ready to pass a bill which will give to the national banks the power to still further inflate and control the currency. If there be not enough currency to-day, the question may be asked whether the proper remedy is not to increase silver coin instead of national-bank notes. That query I answer affirmatively. There arises also the question whether Congress in the proper exercise of its power over the currency should go to the extent of giving to the national banks unlimited control over that factor which you call the elasticity of the currency.

Now, for my part, I favor the national banking system, and have always done so; but it seems to me the time has come when the banks shall be deprived of the power of issue; that the time has come when there will be gold and silver enough in coin and gold and silver enough in bullion, with power in the United States to issue its certificates of deposit and to maintain and issue its "greenbacks"—I say the time has come, in my judgment, when this combination and ability will afford all the elasticity our currency can need, and for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill, and thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] for the opportunity of so stating.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, before I yield to the gentleman from Texas, I desire to know how much time of the hour is left?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-one minutes of the hour remain.

Mr. REAGAN. I only want two or three minutes.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I will yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy all of the time granted to me by the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois. Now the banks have the power to extend their capital to an unlimited extent by the reorganization of their associations, and we would not, by refusing to pass this bill, prevent them from increasing their capital stock if they desire to do so, because it will be within their power to increase it If extensions of privilege are to be made by special bills, it seems to me it would be better in a general bill to make such general provision.

But I wish to say that while I may not oppose the passage of the bill, nevertheless I wish to enter my protest that it must not be construed to sanction the present policy of authorizing national banks to issue currency.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I have promised one minute to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reiterate what has been said by the gentleman from Texas, and also the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON]. I consider that unless a protest be made at this time this bill might be considered by the country as a declaration on the part of the House that further issue of bank notes would not be disturbed.

Now, with the distinct understanding that this is not to be taken as a declaration on the part of the House to that extent, or even looking in that direction, I suppose a vote might be taken. I shall, however, for the reason I have stated, vote against it. I do protest against this House making a declaration which shall seem to the country to be in favor of the further continuance of the national banking system.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. Who is the gentleman making this understanding with, that the passage of this bill is to be taken to mean so and so?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. The author of the bill says he intends nothing of the kind; that is all.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you think that will amount to much after the bill is passed and becomes law?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I do not. I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I think I comply with the manifest desire of the House to call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, demanded a division on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 54.

Mr. RANDALL, Mr. TILLMAN, and Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be again reported, as it is a very important one.

The bill was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 120, not voting 75, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I object.

The Clerk then recapitulated the names of those voting.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. BARBOUR with Mr. PIRCE, until further notice.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. GROSVENOR, until further notice.

Mr. BARNES with Mr. DAVENPORT, until further notice.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH, until February 17.

Mr. PINDAR with Mr. HITT.

Mr. HALL with Mr. COOPER, until February 15.

Mr. MILLS with Mr. GUENTHER, for to-day.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. DINGLEY.

Mr. BLOUNT with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. HOLMES.

Mr. STORM with Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MERRIMAN with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. MARKHAM.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. HISCOCK.

Mr. MCCREARY with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. WHITING, for this day.

Mr. BLAND with Mr. WOODBURN, on this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour devoted to the consideration of this business under the rule has expired.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Am I in order, Mr. Speaker, in moving to reconsider and lay on the table the vote by which the bill was passed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may enter the motion to reconsider, but the Chair can not entertain it now.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCMILLIN. On the motion to lay on the table I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. It can not be disposed of now, being business which belongs to the hour which has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. CALDWELL, is detained at home by sickness, which prevented his being present and voting on this bill.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, under the special order of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration, under the special order of the House, of the bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the board of Army officers convened by the President of the United States, by special orders, numbered 78, headquarters of the Army, April 12, 1878, to examine into and report upon the case of Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, having by their report of March 19, 1879, stated that, in their opinion "justice rquired at his (the President's) hands such action as may be necessary to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, and to restore him to the positions of which the sentence deprived him, such restoration to take effect from the date of dismissal from the service;" and

Whereas the President, on the 4th day of May, 1882, remitted so much of the sentence of said court-martial remaining unexecuted as "forever disqualified the said Fitz-John Porter from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States:" Therefore, that justice may be done the said Fitz-John Porter, and to carry into effect the recommendation of said board,

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial promulgated January 27, 1863, and, in his discretion, to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being hereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That said Fitz-John Porter shall receive no pay, compensation, or allowance whatsoever prior to his appointment under this act.

Mr. EVERHART. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EVERHART. Would it be in order at this time to give notice of an amendment to strike out, in the last line, the words "prior to his appointment?"

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may give notice of his intention of offering the amendment, but the bill is not now subject to amendment, being open for general discussion under the order of the House.

Mr. EVERHART. I give notice of my intention to offer at the proper time the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. HAYNES. Mr. Chairman, when the question of General Porter's restoration was before the Forty-eighth Congress I contented myself with simply voting my convictions. Those convictions were in a measure the result of personal observations and personal recollections, and I discuss the question partly from the standpoint of a participant in the second Bull Run campaign.

We have no reason to believe that the present discussion will develop any new facts or give us much new light. The same old evidence, so often sifted, weighed, arranged and rearranged, is all we have in the case now. No witnesses can be summoned here who will not be recognized as old acquaintances. They have been grouped over and over again, and their testimony analyzed and dissected with critical minuteness; and in opening this debate I shall occupy but little time in repeating what has already been so fully rehearsed. I have a few general propositions, a few applications of evidence in bulk rather than in detail; and as corroborative of other testimony in the case I bring to bear a recollection in which I have a reasonable degree of confidence—my own.

I believe it is good military law—it is good military common sense, anyway—that an officer at a distance from his superior must have some discretion in the execution of orders from that superior. Under the commander's immediate eye his directions are not to be deviated from, for he is cognizant of all surroundings and all circumstances and alone responsible for errors of judgment. But at a distance there are a thousand contingencies and circumstances unknown and unforeseen at headquarters that may interpose in the execution of a movement and render a departure from the strict letter of the order imperative.

The commander of an isolated corps who would involve his command in disaster which might be averted by literally obeying the letter of his instructions against obstacles of which the commanding general was ignorant would be properly branded as an incompetent and unworthy of command. Under such circumstances the spirit of the order is to be considered by the subordinate. If its literal execution will clearly defeat the result aimed at, he is a poor corps commander who would not mold his actions to the circumstances.

I apply this principle particularly to Pope's order of August 27, the failure to comply with which in the letter constitutes the first in the series of offenses with which Porter was charged and upon which he was convicted.

Nightfall of that day found Jackson at Manassas Junction, where he had been engaged in destroying such of Pope's captured stores as he had no immediate use for; Hooker, marching from Warrenton Junction directly upon Manassas, had fought Ewell at Kettle Run, and was in bivouac upon Jackson's front near Bristoe Station, and Porter had just arrived at Warrenton. Late in the evening Porter received the order from Pope, whose headquarters were at Bristoe, to march at 1 o'clock, so as to be at Bristoe by daylight. Pope contemplated an early morning attack upon Jackson at Manassas; but Jackson was not there to be attacked according to programme, and it happened that Porter's delay, whether constituting the grievous offense his enemies claim or not, is chargeable with no evil consequences to the campaign. Had a fight occurred according to Pope's anticipations, and had Porter put his corps upon the road at 1 o'clock, as directed, I believe, for reasons which I shall fully state, he would to-day be branded with the odium of incompetency in not observing the proper precautions for preserving the efficiency of his command.

The evacuation of Warrenton at a given hour was not the essence of Pope's order, but the appearance of the Fifth Corps at the other end of the route at as early an hour as possible. And if it be shown that Porter started as early as the conditions would permit, whether it were 1 or 3 o'clock, and that he pushed forward with all possible dispatch, he did all that could have been expected of him and only added one to thousands of precedents ever since war began where subordinate commanders have failed to move precisely as directed as to time, direction, or order, and that without incurring the charge of treachery and the penalty of insubordination.

I believe he fulfilled the military requirements of the situation. His troops, I doubt not, could have made a rapid march of 9 miles under favorable conditions for marching. But I know that, whatever the condition of the troops may have been—whether fresh or exhausted—the conditions of the road and of the night combined were such that no experienced soldier at 1 o'clock would have placed upon that road a corps of nine thousand men with the expectation of holding them together for a forced march of 9 miles. And if odium is to attach to this delay it must be shared by his division generals, who, after a proper examination of the road and the weather, advised it. That the road was crowded with trains at that time there is abundant evidence. As to its general character I am satisfied to be guided by my own recollections, which may be the weakest of evidence to every other member of this House but is the most convincing to myself.

It was my fortune to be a member in good standing of the first Union regiment that passed over the road that day—the Second New Hampshire Regiment, of Grover's brigade, which furnished the skirmishers and led the advance of Hooker's division from Catlett's Station to Kettle Run.

I remember it as a very ordinary country road, in very bad condition and repair. No man can tell me it was a broad, spacious turnpike, where troops could march in unbroken files, for I know to the contrary. I remember its ruts and sloughs and obstructions; that for long distances the wayside trees and bushes grew almost to the very edge of the wheel tracks; that at one point, perhaps a mile from where the enemy was met at Kettle Run, there was considerable difficulty, even in broad daylight, in passing the column over a stream where the bridge had been destroyed. And it was over such a road as this, packed with wagon trains, that Porter was expected to march the Fifth Corps, of nine thousand men, in hours of almost Egyptian darkness.

I know there is evidence of starlight at some time from some witnesses, and that troops marched upon other roads. But there certainly was not a very brilliant illumination when General Patrick's orderlies and staff officers dismounted to feel their way along the road. Colonel Brinton was not favorably impressed with the street-lighting arrangements when he went bumping along the road—running into first a tree and then a wagon, and so dark that he was unable to distinguish either until upon it. How the Fifth Corps would have gone galloping down that road at the rate of 3 miles an hour in order to be at Bristoe by daylight!

But, Mr. Chairman, I have excellent reasons for remembering the condition of the night at one end of Porter's route at least.

I was on the picket line that night, and Yankee pickets upon Stonewall Jackson's front on the night of an engagement generally had a pretty keen eye for their surroundings. I remember that Hooker's division was hardly in bivouac before a heavy mist settled down like a pall and held until dispelled by the morning sun. And I re-enforce my own recollections as to the darkness of the night by that of other members of my regiment. General Gilman Marston, at that time in command of the regiment (a former member of this House, and well known to some of you, an honored Republican leader in my State), attempted to visit the picket line that night, but lost his way on account of the darkness and gave up the attempt. And I take the liberty to say that he with other officers and men of the regiment—Republicans—stand with me in pleading justice for General Porter. With such recollections I can arrive at but one conclusion, that Porter acted with sound military judgment in delaying his march until the conditions were such that he could hold his troops together and deliver them a compact, effective force to his commander.

In military as in other affairs theory is one thing and practice is another. You can not predicate the march of ten thousand men upon the distance one man can cover. Those of us who have marched in the dusty column need not to be told how a body of troops disintegrates, scatters, and loses its cohesion under such circumstances as I have cited. The best corps, unable to preserve its military compactness, degenerates into a sort of go-as-you-please walking match scattered along the line of march, and a great many please to go very slow—to take very long rests and very frequent ones. There are many instances to illustrate this. In the summer of 1863 the division of the Third Army Corps, with which I was connected, was started for a night march from Gum Springs to Monocacy, following from Edwards Ferry the tow-path of the canal. We had a better road than that from Warrenton to Bristoe; but when the general went into camp that night he had only a few hundred men with him. The bulk of his command were bivouacked in little squads for miles along the river bank, and it took a good part of the next day to bring the division together again. These men were not tenderfoots nor green troops. They were the veterans of the "white diamond," and only a few days later fought at Gettysburg with a stubborn valor and a discipline never excelled. The division general was an officer of marked ability. But in this instance he erred in practical judgment, with the result that for many hours his command was virtually obliterated as an effective force.

It is a dangerous error to commit—in my mind an inexcusable one—where everything may depend upon keeping troops well in hand and in compact organization. And the fact that Porter avoided such a blunder—the judicious exercise of a discretion for which he should have been thanked and applauded—was made one of the counts upon which he was tried, convicted, cashiered, and disgraced. I refuse to sign the verdict.

I have no personal prejudices for or against to bias my judgment in this matter. The strongest prejudices I have ever entertained were against Porter, but they disappeared when I proceeded to examine the case.

I do not accept the estimate of Pope which is entertained by many of Porter's friends. It was his misfortune to be transferred from a command where he had won honorable distinction. It was against his own wishes and judgment, as he sets forth in a recent magazine article. I will not assert that he did not do as well as any other would have done under the manifold difficulties which he found ready-made in his new command. He was called to face difficulties and untangle a desperate condition of affairs, in the making of which he had no hand and no responsibility. That he failed should not be quoted to his discredit more than the failure of many another under less trying conditions. He was precipitated into a campaign, bewildering in the rapidity and complication of its movements, against the best military leaders and the best troops of the confederacy, upon a field with which he was but imperfectly acquainted and without opportunity to establish with his own troops those relations of mutual confidence and understanding that are so important between commander and men.

There was more than one disappointment in the execution of his plans. Porter was not the only officer upon whom he throws the burden of disappointing him at a critical moment. That Reynolds and Sigel did not re-enforce King on the afternoon of the 28th he says "seems unaccountable." The reason given—that McDowell was absent from the corps, having lost his way—he says "is not satisfactory." To his "great disappointment and surprise" (I quote his own language) he learned the next morning that King had fallen back toward Manassas Junction, and that neither Sigel nor Reynolds had been engaged. Others than Porter failed to meet his expectations, and at critical moments, too. In the mild way I have quoted he makes them to a certain extent scape-goats for the failure of his campaign, but they continued to be honored and trusted, as they deserved to be. It is rarely that all the details of such a campaign as this move according to preconceived order and plan.

All of these officers who, as he says, failed him at times subsequently did desperate fighting in the execution of his orders, and none better than Porter. And the selection of Porter from them all to be branded as a traitor, and made responsible for the failure of the campaign, I look upon as largely in the spirit of a return of compliments. If we could read the minds of men, if we could view the hidden springs which influence their actions, even when they are unaware, we should find that it was Porter's disrespectful and inexcusable allusions to Pope, cropping out at times, which pointed him as an object of suspicion and a mark for revenge. McDowell or Sigel or Heintzelman never would have been tried for the failures of movement upon which Porter was tried. I believe if either of these officers had been in Porter's place and he in theirs, and they had conducted their movements precisely as he did his, we should never have had the court-martial which was subsequently convened, and no Union general of that campaign would have suffered for more than twenty years a stigma worse than death. There was no breach of military discipline so common as this, and if the results of campaigns had been influenced by the expressed opinions of subordinates concerning superiors, many a battle that was won by the courage and devotion of the growlers would have been lost; and if those so offending had been made the subjects of military discipline the Army would speedily have been resolved into one great general court-martial. Fitz-John Porter was one of the growlers, but his punishment has been out of all proportion to his offense. The elimination of a few unfortunate words of his from this case would have weakened it in an astonishing degree. But for the antagonisms they naturally aroused Gaines's Mill, Savage Station, White Oak Swamp, and Malvern Hill—a military record without a blemish—would have counted as something against his failure to execute orders, impossible to execute, at Warrenton and Groveton.

I have dwelt upon the order of the 27th somewhat in the character of a witness, stating the reasons which led to my absolute conviction of Porter's innocence. In my judgment there is not a pin there upon which to hang a suspicion of insubordination in motive or in act. The disproving of bad intentions and bad conduct here not only removes a specific charge from the case against Porter, but measurably weakens the presumption of treacherous disobedience on the 29th. It is not my purpose to beat the old straw so often beaten, or to recapitulate in detail the evidence so often repeated here. It should be by this time as familiar as household words. Upon it Grant, and Schofield, and Terry, and Getty grounded their belief in Porter's innocence.

My general conclusions in regard to the 29th I summarize very briefly. There can be no question, I think, that Pope's first order to march upon Centreville was complied with. The disobedience did not commence there. There can be no question that the joint order directing the movement toward Gainesville was complied with, and he was executing the order of General Pope, in letter and in spirit, when at Dawkin's Branch he was confronted by conditions of which Pope was absolutely ignorant. In his joint order he had informed Porter that—

> The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or the next day.

But Porter found that it was not "to-morrow night or the next day" that he might look for the arrival of Longstreet, for Longstreet had already arrived, and was at that moment confronting him. A mounted man direct from Gainesville met them with the startling news that he had seen the enemy's skirmishers there with their main body close behind. A little farther on Porter's skirmishers encountered those of the enemy, and he posted his batteries and placed his troops in position. Prisoners were taken—Longstreet's men—and information was received from Buford that as early as 8.45 that morning seventeen regiments, with battery and cavalry, had passed through Gainesville.

It is very easy to say that Porter should have attacked. In the orders to this time received there were no directions to attack. As soon as communications were established with the forces upon the right he was directed to halt. It is unquestionable that when Pope issued the joint order he was under the impression and belief that there was a free road to Gainesville and beyond. It rests upon his own testimony before the court-martial that when he issued the 4.30 order to Porter it was for an attack upon Jackson's right. Porter's fault, in the judgment of those who condemned him, was not that he did not attack Longstreet, but that he neglected to give the finishing blow to Jackson before Longstreet arrived. With the actual situation upon Porter's front, as he knew it then and as we know it now, with no specific orders to attack until the 4.30 order came, the whole question of disobedience is brought to that one point.

If the evidence of half a dozen officers at Porter's headquarters is to be given any weight, that order did not reach Porter until after sundown. If Porter's division generals are truthful men, he went to the front, had troops deployed, and advanced but did not attack, deterred by the protests of his officers, when the strength of the enemy and of his position was developed in the increasing gloom of night. This was not the spirit of an insubordinate officer. General Porter knew that Pope absolutely misapprehended the situation, but for all that he started to carry out the order; and it was for us the one fortunate feature of that campaign of disaster that it was received too late to be put into execution.

Since the court-martial we have had opened up sources of information not then available. If there is one man above all others who should be presumed to know the actual situation on Porter's front, who should be able to clear up the disputed point as to the position of Longstreet's corps, whose judgment we would accept as to the probable results of movements in that portion of the field, that man is General Longstreet himself. He gave his testimony before the Schofield board, and we can not ignore his statements.

As a concise summary, I call attention to an extract from his article entitled "Our March against Pope," in the February number of The Century Magazine. It not only shows how completely General Pope misunderstood the actual situation, but, making all due allowance which prejudice can possibly suggest, it points with the finger of a military expert the disastrous results which might have come to the Union arms had Porter precipitated himself, not upon Jackson's right but upon Longstreet's veterans, outnumbering him two or three to one. General Longstreet says:

> General Pope, sanguine by nature, was not careful enough to keep himself informed about the movements of his enemy. At half past 4 on the afternoon of the 29th he issued an order for Porter to attack Jackson's right, supposing I was at Thoroughfare Gap, when in fact I had been in position since noon, and was anxiously awaiting attack. It has been said that General Stuart, by raising a dust in front of Porter, so impressed him that he did not offer battle. I know nothing of the truth of the story, and never heard of it till after the war. If from any such cause Porter was prevented from attacking me it was to our disadvantage, and delayed our victory twenty-four hours. Porter knew I was in his front. He had captured one or two of my men, which gave him information of my position before he actually saw me. If Porter had not appeared when he did I would have attacked by our right early in the afternoon. In that event Porter would have had a fine opportunity to take me on the wing and strike a fearful blow. As it was, he was a check upon my move against Pope's main position. If I had advanced upon Pope I would have been under an enfilade fire from Porter's batteries, and if I had advanced upon Porter I would have been under a fire from the batteries on Pope's front as severe as the raking fire from my batteries the next day, when Pope was massed against Jackson. Had Porter attacked me between noon and night on the 29th I should have received his nine thousand with about double that number. I would have held my line to receive the attack, and as soon as his line developed its strength I would have thrown three brigades forward beyond his extreme left. When my line of battle had broken up the attack, as it certainly would have done, these three brigades would have been thrown forward at the flank, and at the same time my main line would have pushed on in the pursuit. The result would have been Porter's retreat in confusion, and I might possibly have reached Pope's left and rear in time to cut him off. When his army was well concentrated on the 30th he was badly cut up and defeated. It does not seem unreasonable to conclude that attack on the 29th in his disjointed condition would have been attended with more disastrous results to him. If I had been attacked under the 4.30 order the result might have been less damaging, as Porter would have had the night to cover his retreat, and the Federal Army could have availed itself of the darkness to screen its move back across Bull Run. But Porter's attack at night, if not followed by the retreat of the army, would have drawn me around the Federal left, and put me in a position for striking the next day.
> Colonel Marshal, of General Lee's staff, in his evidence before the Fitz-John Porter board, puts my forces on the 29th at thirty thousand. It is difficult to see how Porter with nine thousand men was to march over thirty thousand of the best soldiers the world ever knew. Any move that would have precipitated battle would have been to our advantage, as we were ready at all points and waiting for an opportunity to fight. The situation will be better understood when we reflect that the armies were too evenly balanced to admit mistakes on either side. I was waiting for an opportunity to get into the Federal lines close upon the heels of their own troops. The opportunity came on the 30th, but the Federal Army was then concentrated; had it come on the 29th I would have been greatly pleased.

One point in the report of the Schofield board should be especially impressed upon this House—that section wherein they prick the bubble so often blown in debate—the big guns bellowing, "This way, Fitz-John Porter!" It will bear repeating:

> The judgment of the court-martial upon General Porter's conduct was evidently based upon greatly erroneous impressions, not only respecting what that conduct really was and the orders under which he was acting, but also respecting all the circumstances under which he acted. Especially was this true in respect to the character of the battle of the 29th of August. That battle consisted of a number of sharp and gallant combats between small portions of the opposing forces. Those combats were of short duration and were separated by long intervals of simple skirmishing and artillery duels. Until after 6 o'clock only a small part of the troops on either side were engaged at any time during the afternoon. Then, about sunset, one additional division on each side was engaged near Groveton. The musketry of that last contest and the yells of the confederate troops about dark were distinctly heard by the officers of Porter's corps; but at no other time during all that afternoon was the volume of musketry such that it could be heard at the position of Porter's troops. No sound but that of artillery was heard by them during all those hours when Porter was understood by the court-martial to have been listening to the sounds of a furious battle raging immediately to his right. And those sounds of artillery were by no means such as to indicate a general battle.

The reports of the 29th and those of the 30th of August have somehow been strangely confounded with each other. Even the confederate reports have, since the termination of the war, been similarly misconstrued. Those of the 30th have been misquoted as referring to the 29th, thus to prove that a furious battle was going on while Porter was comparatively inactive on the 29th. The fierce and gallant struggle of his own troops on the 30th has thus been used to sustain the original error under which he was condemned. General Porter was, in effect, condemned for not having taken any part in his own battle.

There are, perhaps, others than myself upon this floor who can bear testimony to the correctness of these findings. The manner in which my own brigade was put in was a sample of this day's work. "Where are my supports?" inquired Grover of the aide when his line was formed in the edge of the woods. "Oh, they are coming!" was the response; "your orders are to advance at once and carry the railroad embankment with the bayonet!" It was all over inside of ten minutes. Five hundred men of Grover's skeleton brigade lay dead or wounded, and what there was left came back to reform and to hunt for those "supports." They came up after a time, went in as we had gone in and came out as we came out. And so it went on through the entire day of the 29th—sharp dashes, quickly over, with long intervals of time between. There was no time when the artillery firing was general, continuous, or heavy. And the plan of the day, if plan there was, seems to have been to put in one brigade at a time—and veteran brigades were small in the army—one brigade at a time, to be slaughtered, overwhelmed, and repulsed, no matter how desperate the assault nor how well sustained; and I assert that, even to those in the immediate vicinity of the fighting, those to the north of the Centreville pike, there was nothing in the volume or character of the firing to indicate a general engagement. It was on the following day, when the lines were blazing from the Henry Hill to Groveton, that the fight took the character of a general engagement, with a continuous roar of both musketry and artillery that made itself heard even in Washington. It was then that the big guns were bellowing, "This way, Fitz-John Porter!" and that they did not call in vain is attested by the official reports and by the death-roll of the Fifth Corps then recorded.

All sorts of sympathies and prejudices have been appealed to against Porter. He has been compared to Benedict Arnold. One, with unimpaired skill and valor, led his command in one of its hardest fights and was trusted with important commands for months after every item of his alleged treason had been committed. The other fled in haste to the enemy, took arms in their service, and cast his fortunes with them forevermore. And I have been greatly impressed within a few days by the statement made to me by a distinguished member of this House—one who will not vote as I shall vote upon this bill—that he was in position to daily observe Fitz-John Porter in the early days of his retirement and disgrace, and was struck by the eagerness with which he scanned the papers for war news, his unconcealed disgust over Union reverses, and his exultation over the triumphs of our arms.

The political prejudices of the war times are appealed to. No man possesses them in a greater degree than myself, but they are not to lead me into an indorsement of what I consider a wrong to a patriotic Union soldier.

How often have we been appealed to by the memory of those who fell at Groveton, a worse than useless sacrifice, and all ascribed to Porter's treachery! But with all due modesty I shall insist that none can have a better right to speak for the patriotic dead of that great field than the members of Grover's brigade.

We are appealed to for a vindication of the memory and judgment of Abraham Lincoln. The man will never live who has a greater reverence for that name and memory than I have. There are two names that will pass down in history linked together as the saviours of the Union. The hand of the great civil leader fell from the helm just as the ship of state he had guided so skillfully came sailing into port. The captain who led our armies left us only the other day. Both at one time equally believed in the justice of Porter's sentence. But he to whom the opportunity was given for a calm, dispassionate review of the case proclaimed the injustice of the verdict, and became the earnest champion of Porter's cause. And he is a bold man who to-day dares impugn the military judgment and honesty of purpose of Ulysses S. Grant. We know Lincoln's great sense of justice and humanity. We know that in the darkest days of the war he could plead with malice toward none, with charity for all. Could he speak to-day he would ask no man to stifle an honest conviction nor to halt in what he might consider the path of justice simply as an indorsement of his signature upon a court-martial verdict. And had it been permitted to him to live as Grant lived, I believe they would have stood together in their demand for justice to Fitz-John Porter.

The political prejudices of the present day should not be a factor in this discussion. The statement in the minority report now before us that the Republican members of the Forty-eighth Congress, "holding in reverence the memories of the great war Secretary who convened the court, the illustrious men who constituted it, and the lamented President who approved its findings, voted with approximte unanimity against reopening the case," is just a grain misleading. The Republican minority who then voted for Porter was not only respectable in point of numbers, but the character of their Republicanism is such that I do not feel out of place in their company.

And speaking for the constituency I represent—for the district in which, at Portsmouth by the sea, Fitz-John Porter first saw the light of day—I know that I am backed in my position and my vote by thousands of my own political faith, soldiers as well as civilians. I am not inappreciative nor unmindful of the moral influence of such a support, but if I stood solitary and alone among all the Republicans of this country in supporting this bill, I should vote as I have voted once and as I shall vote again. To do otherwise would be to outrage my own convictions and belittle my own judgment. I have no personal acquaintance with Fitz-John Porter. I never met him and should not know him were I to meet him to-day. There are no personal friendships, no social or political influences to direct my judgment in his favor. I act simply upon my convictions of right and justice and the equities of his case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire has seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HAYNES. I reserve that time.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, "What in the thunder are we here for?" [Laughter.] "Why are we discussing Fitz-John Porter?" has been heard coming from the members of this House quite frequently of late, and at least one Democrat added to his remark: "You know the Democrats are all going to vote for him anyhow." I believe, sir, that this is true. I believe they are going to vote for him anyhow; but I shall not be deterred from giving the reasons why I think they shoud not vote for him.

The judge-advocate of the military commission, Major Gardner, United States Army, in speaking of this case, well said of the character of this court:

Nine general officers sat in the trial of the petitioner, not as we are sitting, under the ordinary obligation or oath which we took on accepting our commissions, but under the additional obligation of a special oath, prescribed by statute, to, among other things, "well and truly try and determine, according to evidence, and to duly administer justice."

There had not been a court in the American Army of officers of such high rank since General Washington appointed the tribunal (September 29, 1780) which tried Maj. John André, adjutant-general of the British Army.

Most of the members were old friends and acquaintances of the accused, and his relations with the president of that court were of so intimate a character that the latter was reluctant to sit, and only did so, I have been credibly informed, because the former wished it.

These nine general officers were—

1. Maj. Gen. David Hunter, United States Volunteers, of the District of Columbia. Graduated at United States Military Academy 1822; colonel and brevet major-general, United States Army [recently deceased.]

2. Maj. Gen. Ethan Allen Hitchcock, of Vermont. Graduated at United States Military Academy 1817; now deceased.

3. Brig. Gen. Rufus King, United States Volunteers, of New York. Graduated at United States Military Academy 1833; subsequently resident minister to Rome; now deceased.

4. Brig. Gen. Benjamin Mayberry Prentiss, United States Volunteers, of Virginia; subsequently appointed major-general of volunteers, to date November 29, 1862. [Eulogized by Hon. Reverdy Jonnson in 1863 (printed pamphlet, page 11) for "skillful defense of Helena, Ark."]

5. Brig. Gen. James Brewerton Ricketts, United States Volunteers, of New York. Graduated at United States Military Academy 1839; brevet major-general, United States Army; now major-general, United States Army; on retired-list.

6. Brig. Gen. Silas Casey, United States Volunteers, of Rhode Island. Graduated at United States Military Academy 1826; subsequently appointed major-general of United States Volunteers, to date May 31, 1862, in acknowledgment of service in battle of "Fair Oaks;" brevet major-general, United States Army [deceased.]

7. Brig. Gen. James Abram Garfield, United States Volunteers, of Ohio, formerly chief of staff to Major-General Rosecrans; afterward major-general United States Volunteers for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Chickamauga. Representative in Congress from Ohio since 1862 [Senator and President; deceased.]

8. Brig. Gen. Napoleon B. Buford, United States Volunteers, of Kentucky. Graduated at United States Military Academy 1827; brevet major-general United States Volunteers; subsequently special United States commissioner for Indian affairs.

9. Brig. Gen. John P. Slough, United States Volunteers; afterward chief-justice Territory of New Mexico; now deceased.

The judge-advocate was Hon. Joseph Holt, Judge-Advocate-General, who had been Secretary of War under President Buchanan, and is now a brigadier-general on the retired-list of the Army.

To his carefully prepared written defense on the merits the judge-advocate of the court made no reply whatever; but, in alluding to the length of the investigation, said (page 727, G. C. M. Rec.):

"I will simply remark that this case has been thoroughly and most patiently investigated. A continuous session of some forty-five days sufficiently attests this. Indeed, the greater part of the evidence touching the more important and the more severely contested points has, by re-examination and cross-examination, been again and again impressed upon your minds, so that I now feel entirely satisfied that it is completely comprehended and appreciated by you in all its bearings.

"Whatever, therefore, of inaccuracies of interpretation of testimony, and whatever of illogical deduction from it may have found a place in the very elaborate defense of the accused, which has been read, may be safely left for their correction to the recollection and the judgment of the court."

The accused in his defense, on his trial, said, in addressing that court (page 256, G. C. M. Rec.):

"Yourselves, most if not all of you, have known me well. Your eminent official law adviser (meaning Judge-Advocate-General Holt), who has conducted this prosecution calmly and fairly so far as on him depended, but with the vigilance and energy which his duty demanded, himself, in the recent past, when numerous events hinged on the great sway which in his high post he bore, has trusted me, and has felt that his trust was in no wise betrayed."

This was the character of the court. Hon. Reverdy Johnson and Charles Evans represented the accused before that court; both able men. He had the advantage of as able counsel as this country could afford. And yet, after long and patiently trying the case, the court decided against him. President Lincoln, who had the case in his hands at least two days—and it is attested he carefully reviewed it—approved the sentence. President Arthur has put his seal of office against him on constitutional grounds, at least, and, I think, wisely did so; but I shall leave the discussion of the constitutional question to gentlemen who will follow me.

I predicate my judgment in this matter upon the evidence taken at the time and upon the official reports made at the time, so far as they were made; and I am led to say "so far as they were made" because some of Porter's friends who had commands during the engagements of the 29th and 30th of August, 1862, did not make as full reports as they ought to have made and as they might have made had he not, in my opinion, interfered with them.

To start now on the merits. We find Porter landing at Acquia Creek on the 21st of August. He debarked his troops, and on the 22d marched to Deep Creek. There is where I find his troops on the 22d day of August. He remained at Falmouth with General Burnside, while his army was up at Deep Creek and Kelly's Ford from the 22d to the 25th or 26th. I mention this to controvert the statement or the idea that you have had conveyed to you that his troops were sorely tired, footsore, and weary when they arrived at Warrenton Junction on the 27th with Sykes's division.

On the 26th he marched to within 5 miles of Bealeton, a distance of 8 miles. Morell had marched on the 23d to Kelly's Ford, which is 8 miles from Bealeton; on the 27th Sykes's division marched to Bealeton, 5 miles, and to Warrenton Junction, 7 miles, making a distance of 12 miles for that day and 8 the day before; and no march at all for the three days previous.

Morell marched from Kelly's Ford 8 miles to Bealeton and 7 miles to Warrenton Junction on the 27th. He had not marched over 8 miles during the three previous days. We find that Sykes arrived at Warrenton Junction at as early as 10 o'clock with the head of his column, and that Morell arrived there at as early as 2 o'clock with the head of his column. They might have arrived earlier, either column, if they had so desired. This places them in camp there, not footsore, weary, and shoeless, but fresh to go on to do battle if called upon. And I wish here to say, if the soldiers of that command had been called upon to march or do battle I believe every single man of them would have gladly responded.

At 9.30 that evening General Porter received, by the hands of Captain De Kay, a United States officer (Porter was a United States officer), from General Pope the following order:

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF VIRGINIA.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock—

Not at half past 1 or any other hour except 1—to-night, and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight—

Not at 10 o'clock the next day, but—by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is.

I will insert it in full:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER,
Warrenton Junction:

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here at daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about 300 killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas, and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately. Also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight.

I send an officer with this dispatch, who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks also that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction, leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately upon his doing so. If Banks is not at the Junction, instruct Colonel Clary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run, and post a regiment and section of artillery with it.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEO. D. RUGGLES
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

The order indicates trouble ahead, and this is the important portion of the order:

It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight.

Now, to show the spirit with which Porter had arrived at this point, I want to read you something of what he said:

I send you the last order from General Pope—

This is General Porter telegraphing to General Burnside—which indicates the future as well as the present. Wagons are rolling along rapidly to the rear, as if a mighty power was propelling them. I see no cause for alarm, though I think this order may cause it. McDowell moves to Gainesville, where Sigel now is. The latter got to Buckland Bridge in time to put out the fire and kick the enemy, who is pursuing his route unmolested to the Shenandoah or Loudoun County. The forces are Longstreet's, A. P. Hill's, Jackson's, Whiting's, Ewell's, and Anderson's (late Huger's) divisions.

Longstreet is said by a deserter to be very strong. They have much artillery and long wagon trains. The raid on the railroad was near Cedar Creek, and made by a regiment of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and a section of artillery. The place was guarded by nearly three regiments of infantry and some cavalry. They routed the guard, captured the train and many men, destroyed the bridge, and retired leisurely down the road toward Manassas. It can easily be repaired. No troops are coming up, except new troops, that I can hear of. Sturgis is here with two regiments. Four were cut off by the raid. The position of the troops is given in the order. No enemy in our original front. A letter of General Lee, seized when Stuart's assistant adjutant-general was taken, directs Stuart to leave a squadron only to watch in front of Hanover Junction, &c. Everything has moved up north. I find a vast difference between these troops and ours, but I suppose they were new, as to-day they burnt their clothes, &c., when there was not the least cause. I hear that they are much demoralized, and needed some good troops to give them heart, and I think head. We are working now to get behind Bull Run, and, I presume, will be there in a few days, if strategy don't use us up. The strategy is magnificent, and tactics in the inverse proportion. I would like some of my ambulances. I would like also to be ordered to return to Fredericksburg to push toward Hanover, or with a larger force to push toward Orange Court-House. I wish Sumner was at Washington, and up near the Monocacy, with good batteries. I do not doubt the enemy have large amounts of supplies provided for them, and I believe they have a contempt for this Army of Virginia. I wish myself away from it, with all our old Army of the Potomac, and so do our companions. I was informed to-day, by the best authority, that, in opposition to General Pope's views, this army was pushed out to save the Army of the Potomac—an army that could take care of itself. Pope says he long since wanted to go behind the Occoquan.

I am in great need of ambulances, and the officers need medicines, which, for want of transportation, were left behind. I hear many of the sick of my corps are in houses on the road very sick. I think there is no fear of an enemy crossing the Rappahannock. The cavalry are all in the advance of the rebel army. At Kelly's and Barnett's Fords much property was left, in consequence of the wagons going down for grain, &c. If you can push up the grain to-night please do so direct to this place. There is no grain here or anywhere, and this army is wretchedly supplied in that line. Pope says he never could get enough.

Most of this is private, but if you can get me away please do so. Make what use of this you choose, so it does good.

Don't let the alarm here disturb you. If you had a good force you could go to Richmond. A force should at once be pushed on to Manassas to open the road.

Our provisions are very short.

F. J. PORTER.

Here is another:

I hope Mac's at work, and we will soon be ordered out of this. It would seem, from proper statements of the enemy, that he was wandering around loose; but I expect they know what they are doing, which is more than any one here or anywhere knows.

I read these, Mr. Chairman, to show the feeling that Porter had for Pope, to show that he had no loyalty in his heart for his commanding general. When he received that order from the hands of De Kay at 9.30, instructing him that it was of the utmost importance for him to be at Bristoe Station at daylight, instead of at once saying to the generals in his tent "We must march at 1 o'clock; it is all-important that we do so"—instead of that, he says, "There is an order to move at 1 o'clock." He did not inform Morell, Sykes, or Butterfield, the officers who were in his tent, of the importance of the order (and they all swear that they did not know); he "simply mentioned the order," knowing that those officers, ignorant of its importance, would say, "Why start at 1?" If he had ordered them to march at 1 o'clock they would have done so. Sykes says that if he had received such an order from Pope, or from Porter, he would have moved, but not understanding he said, "Oh, don't move at 1; wait till daylight." So said Morell and Butterfield, for the same reasons.

Porter, on his own account, knowing of the order, its importance, ought to have decided to comply promptly, but fearing, probably, that he might be in time to help Pope, and it being inconvenient, he directed the movement to commence at 3 o'clock, which meant 4. He agreed the night was dark, and the troops were tired. They had marched 12 miles, one division of them, and the other 15 miles, that day. He says the wagons encumbered the road. How did he get information about these wagons? From Drake De Kay. Porter had not been on the road himself; none of his officers had been on the road; but Drake De Kay, when he brought the order, said to Porter:

I have been some time in getting here, because of the wagons encumbering the road part of the way; but I passed the last of them at Catlett's Station.

That station is three miles and a half from Warrenton. De Kay reported that he had passed the last of the wagons there, and he said, "If we march rapidly, we shall probably overtake the wagons by daylight." But Porter chose to put another construction on it, and to say that the wagons encumbered the road, and that that was one of the reasons why he could not march. Why, Mr. Chairman, if he had desired to march he would have said to Sykes: "Send out a company, or a regiment, or a brigade if necessary, and clear the road of wagons; it is of the utmost importance that we move at 1 o'clock and be at Bristoe Station at daylight." But instead of doing so, he went off quietly to his tent, and slept, not even sending word to Pope that he would not move for two or three hours after he was ordered. Could he have moved? The night was dark, I admit; but was the road encumbered with wagons? Myers says that he parked the general train at Catlett's. The wagons beyond, or ahead of him, belonged to the troops ahead.

Mr. BRAGG. That was only one line.

Mr. STEELE. He parked the supply train. Heintzelman's troops, with wagons following them, pulled on and went into camp, arriving there the next morning early. Porter moved at daylight, and when he arrived where this train of Myers's camped they had pulled out on the road again and he had great difficulty in getting them out of his way. But he would not have encountered them if he had moved when he was ordered, and when he ought to have moved. Mr. Chairman, if Porter had had a desire to serve Pope, his commanding officer, as he should have done—if McClellan had given the order—Porter would have got through that night. He was hoping at the time he received the order to be either ordered back to Falmouth or on to Washington. He wanted Pope defeated. He could not have known but that it was all-important that he should be at Bristoe Station next morning at daylight, and he did not know but that the enemy lay between him and the national capital. He did not know but that Longstreet had re-enforced them and that they would be able to whip Pope and then McDowell in detail.

Could Porter have marched that night in obedience to that order? Why, my confederate friends—ex-confederate friends now, I am glad to say—did you not march, those of you who were with Jackson, did you not march that night? Did not Jackson's troops march that day from Salem, fight the battle at Bristoe Station, and that night march to Manassas, one of your divisions on to Centreville and another on to the Warrenton road north of Groveton? Did you not march that day and night 36 miles? If Jackson could march, why could not Porter march? Jackson took his train with him; he made that march with footsore troops; he whipped a portion of our Army and fought another portion. His troops were hungry when they made the march, lived on green corn, but they found supplies at Manassas and took away everything they could.

Mr. OATES. Jackson did not take any wagon-trains with him. They came afterward.

Mr. STEELE. Where was his train?

Mr. OATES. At the rear.

Mr. STEELE. At what point?

Mr. OATES. He left them on the left side of the Rappahannock.

Mr. STEELE. What train was it that was marching over on the Sudley road that Jeb. Stuart, on the morning of the 29th, sent out troops to protect?

Mr. OATES. Those were Jackson's trains that were coming up, but he had marched over that road a good while before.

Mr. STEELE. Jackson came through Thoroughfare Gap and down to Catlett's and went up to Bristoe and fought there and captured some of our troops before Hooker arrived; he then marched part of his troops to Manassas.

Mr. OATES. Trimble went on that night to Manassas Junction.

Mr. BRAGG. They did not go to Catlett's.

Mr. STEELE. At any rate they marched that night, and Jackson's troops were illy shod and many of them barefooted and had not been any too well fed.

Mr. OATES. That is true. They were living on green corn and apples.

Mr. STEELE. The evidence is abundant that troops could have marched on that occasion; there is not a single soldier here who does not know that it was Porter's duty to obey the order he received, and there is not a soldier here but has marched on darker nights than that. If my gallant friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] had received such an order he would have marched, or if he did not it would have been because he failed after trying. He knows it was Porter's duty to have obeyed that order, as he would have done and as every good soldier would have done. I do not think that Porter was disloyal to McClellan. I do not think that he cared to see his country divided, but I do know that he was not loyal to Pope, his commanding officer.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me a word in reply to what he has just said?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], who has alluded to me personally, I can state to this committee that I did march that night on a clean, open, broad turnpike, and the night became so dark that I was compelled to bivouac by the roadside, and could not form a line of tents.

Mr. STEELE. I remember that the gentleman had a great deal of unpleasantness the next evening. He found it very uncomfortable for his health and the health of his command, for Jackson struck his division over about Groveton.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir. On the night of the 28th I participated in the battle, when I was attempting to obey General Pope's order informing me that Jackson was in Centreville with sixteen thousand men, and that by moving down the Warrenton pike quickly we could "bag him." After that order was read to the command General McDowell left it and the command took the road to Centreville, and in less than twenty minutes, with four regiments alone, supported afterward by two, we struck Jackson, and the whole Army of Virginia heard the firing and let us fight that battle against the corps that was said to be 16 miles away.

Mr. STEELE. Well, Mr. Chairman, that in a manner lets me out [laughter], for I was going to tell about that myself. Certainly if ever there was gallant fighting it was done that evening, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] participated in it. And I remember his command was south of Gainesville on the night of the 27th, and that on the 28th he started for Manassas, where General Pope had ordered all of his forces, expecting to find Jackson there, but learning late in the day he had moved north turned his forces for Centreville, and you had just returned to the Warrenton pike; but the darkness of the night before when the gentleman could not see to put his tents in line did not deter Jackson; and it did not deter troops thousands of times after that from marching.

Porter arrived at Bristoe Station at the head of his column at 10 o'clock on the 28th, instead of at daylight as he was ordered. As soon as he arrived there he commenced saying to Pope, "I can not go any farther; my men are exhausted; I must remain where I am." Pope, knowing the influence that was surrounding him, instead of putting Porter under arrest as he should have done consented to his remaining there all that day of the 28th. [SEE MAP.]

On the morning of the 29th, Morell says, between daylight and sunrise, Porter received the following order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—3 a. m.

GENERAL: McDowell has intercepted the retreat of Jackson. Sigel is immediately on the right of McDowell. Kearny and Hooker march to attack the enemy's rear at early dawn.

Major-General Pope directs you to move upon Centreville at the first dawn of day with your whole command, leaving your trains to follow. It is very important that you should be here at a very early hour in the morning. A severe engagement is likely to take place, and your presence is necessary.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Major-General PORTER.

Porter was not impressed with the importance of the order, because it came from Pope; so that instead of pressing forward, "because it was of the utmost importance," he remained at Bristoe until 7 o'clock, and arrived at Manassas Junction, three miles and a half from there, at 9 o'clock. Sykes's division had just passed Manassas Junction; Morell's division had just arrived there, when Porter received the following order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, Va., August 29, 1862.

Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER:

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton turnpike. Be expeditious or we will lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

When Porter received this order to push on to Gainesville Pope staid near the crossing of Bull Run on the night of the 28th, where he wrote the first order, but had in the mean time got to Centreville and found Jackson gone. Instead of being there Jackson had moved most of his force, via the Warrenton and Centreville pike, west to stone house, thence north to a convenient point for it to be placed behind the old railroad embankment, as you may see it on the map to which I invite your attention. A portion of the force from Centreville doubtless marched northwest from there and crossed Bull Run, but Pope thought he was moving in retreat for Thoroughfare Gap.

Mr. BRAGG. There never was but one division of Jackson's at Centreville.

Mr. STEELE. One division was there, and one division had gone up the Manassas and Sudley road, not going to Centreville at all, but all were in position or near the best kind of a line of works on the eve of the 28th, the right resting northwest of Groveton at "A," and the left at near Sudley Ford, on Bull Run.

Porter was ordered then to push forward to Gainesville. "Be expeditious," Pope said to him, "or we shall lose much."

McDowell, the evening before, was in company with my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], of King's division, when the fight began at "B," west of Groveton; he staid just about five minutes. He said to King, "It is not going to amount to much; I will go to Manassas and see Pope." He left them there and came to Manassas; and not finding Pope there, he went back on the Manassas and Sudley road to near the Henry house, and (instead of going to King where his troops were in battle) he goes up where he finds Sigel about 9 o'clock. He stays with Sigel that night. In the morning he finds that Sigel has orders to march in the direction of the enemy toward this old railroad where Jackson had taken position. Sigel's line then was about as follows, his right at "C," near Robinson's, his left a little north Chinn house at "D." He found Reynolds here on the left of Sigel. Some skirmishing had commenced; there were some cannon shots; and he said to Reynolds, "You operate with Sigel, and I will go back and get King and Ricketts." He arrived back at Manassas Junction at about the same time Porter arrived with his command. He found that Porter had orders to take one of his divisions (King's) with him on to Gainesville.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Was it not largely upon the testimony of that officer, to cover his own conduct upon that day, that Fitz-John Porter was convicted?

Mr. STEELE. He was convicted fourteen times over without McDowell. McDowell had a court of inquiry and was acquitted, but the court did not explain to me why he left King at a critical moment on the evening of the 28th; it did not explain to me why when he knew there was an engagement coming on, and he had authority to command Sigel and Reynolds, that instead of taking command of them and fighting, he went back after King instead of sending a staff officer for him.

Mr. BRAGG. Does not the acquittal of McDowell, who was so manifestly guilty, by a military court, and his honorable discharge, show what public sentiment in Washington would do to control courts for favorites and to render judgments against those who were not in favor?

Mr. STEELE. "Control the courts for favorites!" If Porter had friends in the Army they were on that court. He was a protégé of Hitchcock's; and whenever he came to Washington he would always call upon General Hunter, recently deceased, and when Hunter would go to New York he would always call upon Porter. They were intimate associates. Seven of the members of the court were graduates of West Point—fellow-students or fellow-classmates of Porter's. I want to say here, before I forget it, that if a man ever had a fair show before a court Porter had it.

Much has been said about the Secretary of War expediting the proceedings of the court. The Secretary of War only made the usual order. These officers were needed; and the Secretary of War only made the order that is always made when courts are allowed to sit without regard to hours. And at the close of the proceedings of that court the judge-advocate submitted the case without argument, while Reverdy Johnson and Mr. Ewing, able lawyers, used forty pages of the three hundred which were in the case in his defense.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRAGG. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana whether, under military law, after the judge-advocate had submitted the case without argument, he was not permitted to be present with the court during their deliberations; and whether he did not make his argument on paper, giving his views to the President without the counsel for the defendant having been heard?

Mr. STEELE. I need not tell the gentleman from Wisconsin that the judge-advocate is not only counsel for the prosecution, but counsel also for the defense in military courts. It is his duty, and he is sworn to do his duty fairly, and he did not submit his views but a brief of the case to the President, and by the President's direction, after the case had been submitted to him by General Halleck.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes; but let me ask the gentleman, do you think a lawyer after a heated contest of twenty days or more with some of the ablest legal minds in the United States, if he be permitted, as he is as judge-advocate, to write a review of the case, would fail to write it to correspond with the argument he made, so as to make him successful in that contest?

Mr. STEELE. I assert that if the judge-advocate had the feeling of the gentleman from Wisconsin he probably would.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir, undoubtedly; or any other lawyer.

Mr. STEELE. But Mr. Holt did not. If he had the feeling of the gentleman from Wisconsin he would not have submitted the case to the court without argument as he did.

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir.

Mr. STEELE. But Mr. Holt did do it.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, Mr. Holt did do it. I will tell you why.

Mr. STEELE. He said to the court, "You gentlemen are able; you have heard all the evidence, and you are competent to decide for yourselves."

Mr. BRAGG. Permit me to state where the difference was. Would not the gentleman infer that the judge-advocate by remaining with the court would be able to control the sentiment and the opinions of nine or ten of its members?

Mr. STEELE. No; you give him credit in this for more than you give him on any other account.

Mr. BRAGG. The promotions which followed showed the incentive for doing it.

A MEMBER. Who was promoted?

Mr. BRAGG. Several.

Mr. STEELE. Name one.

Mr. BRAGG. I have not the court or the record before me.

Mr. STEELE. I have the court and the record and there is not a scintilla of evidence to justify the gentleman's assertion. Some of the officers were subsequently promoted, but for well-merited service on the field.

Mr. BRAGG. I will show it to you by and by.

Mr. STEELE. You do President Lincoln injustice. Porter, in obedience to the order he received, took his corps and King and marched toward Gainesville in "pursuit of the enemy." Porter thought "If the enemy has got away from Pope it is a good time for me to go in; I have my own corps, and I have King's division, and I will join in the pursuit."

But the order I have read came to him verbally through General Gibbon, than whom there was no better soldier during the war or one more intelligent or truthful; but Porter felt so bitter toward Pope he wanted to quibble and he sent Dr. Abbot to Pope, saying, "I want you to give me written orders." McDowell, when he found King was going away, wrote to Pope, "How is it you take King away from me?" Now, those two communications reached Pope about the same time. One wanted a written order, and the other wanted an order so he might get King back. Then Pope wrote this order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 30, 1862.

Generals MCDOWELL and PORTER:

You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run, at Centreville, to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall upon the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to rejoin the other divisions of his corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be had in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day. My own headquarters will be for the present time with Heintzelman's corps, or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Now, that joint order only carried out the general idea that he had given to Porter to move on to Gainesville, but if any considerable advantage could be derived by changing this plan, they were at liberty to make such a change in their own discretion.

Mr. OATES. What date does the gentleman now refer to?

Mr. STEELE. I refer now to the morning of the 29th. All three of these orders were dated on that day.

Porter arrived at Dawkin's Branch at "E," where he received this latter order. It had been sent an hour before, but reached him at that point. McDowell's copy of the joint order reached him at this point—the head of King's division at Manassas Junction or Bethlehem church. Porter's column had crossed Dawkin's Branch and gone about half a mile on the other side when the advance met a man on horseback. Morell says he asked him where he had come from. He said he had come from Gainesville and that the skirmishers of the enemy had arrived there and his column was not far on the other side. Now, this was about half past 10 o'clock in the morning, perhaps 11; and yet during that time this column of Porter's had only marched from Bristoe to Manassas Junction, 3½ or 4 miles at farthest, and to point "F," 8 miles at most.

Morell's skirmishers met the skirmishers of the enemy. About this time Porter rode forward to the head of the column, and there found Morell, Griffin, and Butterfield. They had a talk, got off their horses, and held a council of war, I suppose. Porter, when he found that the enemy was there, and it was most probable that there was a mistake about Pope following an enemy, but, on the contrary, that he was facing one, made up his mind that if he helped Pope at all it would be because he could not help himself. So he got off his horse and commented on this joint order. He did not like the idea of being with McDowell; and instead of re-enforcing his skirmishers, if necessary, and going on and complying with the orders which he had received to take King and march with him to the point indicated, or endeavoring in any manner to comply with it or the joint order to move with his force on to Gainesville, he faced about and moved back across the branch and placed a battery facing a little north of west at "F," and one on the left of the road at "G" facing the same way, and waited for what I do not know. Shortly afterward a shot was fired from about the location of the Carrico house by Stuart, who with his cavalry had in the morning moved his command from near Sudley Ford at or about half past 10 o'clock (and just as he was starting ordered one of his officers, who was killed in the engagement, Colonel Patrick, to drive the enemy away from the trains not far from there), and went with his command past Gainesville and met Longstreet about Haymarket, about one and a half miles northwest of Gainesville. Longstreet testifies that at the time of this meeting he stopped his command for an hour, before reaching Gainesville, to let Stuart's command pass to his right.

After passing to his right, Stuart came down along the dotted line which runs by the side of the railroad, as you may see by map, from Gainesville and arrived at Hampton Cole's, and his cavalry doubtless met Porter's skirmishers near Dawkin's Branch, between whom there was an exchange of shots. Rosser had a few dragoons there before Stuart arrived, but Longstreet was several miles back of Stuart. Porter, instead of trying to continue his march or to ascertain in any way whether any considerable number of troops were in his front, waited for a few moments and took the position on the east side of the branch as before indicated, and was there when McDowell arrived. It is claimed that McDowell said, "Porter, this is no place in which to fight a battle; you are too far out," or something of that kind. McDowell on the contrary says he made no such remark. I do not care whether he did or not.

It is not disputed that they consulted and that they rode off to the right and crossed the railroad and halted—I think at "H." The joint order was discussed, and Porter has said that he suggested that McDowell had a right to command him under the sixty-second article of war.

McDowell finally told Porter that he would go to the rear and take King and Ricketts and come in on his (Porter's) right and Reynolds's left. Now, it was about this time that Stuart had arrived at Hampton Cole's, and his skirmishers had advanced, struck those of Porter, and had discovered Porter's artillery in position (three pieces); and he had placed a battery in position not far from the Carrico house on Porter's right front, but Porter's soon put it out of commission. Stuart sent for longer range pieces and for re-enforcements and instructed his men to raise a dust to create an impression that there was a large force with him, and which he truly said in his official report "had the desired effect." McDowell heard the shots and saw the dust, and Porter did also, and the consultation was suddenly closed by McDowell saying to Porter what I have indicated about his going to the right, and also said to Porter, "Put your troops in here," indicating the direction toward where the skirmish firing had been heard and where the dust was being raised. Porter said in reply, "I can't put my men in there without getting into a fight;" and McDowell replied that is what we are here for, and also swears that he left him with the distinct understanding that Porter would obey his order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That was Rosser's cavalry that was raising the dust.

Mr. STEELE. Yes; of Stuart's corps. Porter returned to his troops and ordered a movement to the right, and Griffin, with the leading brigade of Morell's division, had marched across the railroad a short distance beyond "H" to the north, when he came up to some pine brush, thick pine brush, and Griffin says some one hallooed out, "You can not get through there." He halted his command and was ordered back.

In the testimony with reference to this case he was asked the question: "Did you make any effort to get through? Was any reconnaissance made?" He says no; none was made; none whatever; he turned back; in other words, because some one said you can not get through this little thicket of pine brush! One artilleryman swears that when this order was given by Porter to move to the right he took his battery to the right, on the road you see indicated on the map, running north and south, near Dawkin's Branch, and continued to go until ordered back. Porter might have gone on this road. The skirmishers (of the Sixty-second Pennsylvania) were called in when the order to move to the right had been given and the enemy did not follow them up, which shows to me there was not an aggressive enemy between Porter and Gainesville, at least not in his immediate front at this point as shown by the map, and the enemy's batteries fired a shot or two from there, about the position of the Carrico house, and probably a battery from about Britt's house.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Two pieces.

Mr. STEELE. Two pieces. Now Stuart swears he fired a shot or two at this enemy marching here [pointing to the map].

Mr. BRAGG. Let me correct the gentleman. Stuart was killed before the war closed. He did not testify.

Mr. STEELE. His information is reliable. We find it over his official signature made when the events were fresh.

Mr. OATES. His official report you mean. He was killed in May, 1864.

Mr. STEELE. Certainly; and this was in 1862.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. General Stuart gave no testimony.

Mr. STEELE. I hope the gentleman will inform himself on the subject. I was speaking of the official report.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. But you talked about his testimony.

Mr. STEELE. I was calling his testimony his official report over his official signature. And in that report he testified that he fired at the troops coming from the direction of Bristoe (there could be no other column coming from direction of Bristoe, and Porter was marching from that direction while going north), and after firing a shot or two they retired in the direction of Manassas. The evidence is convincing that they all retired in that direction and they marched to the rear. That is the evidence on our side, and is what Stuart says in his report about our leaving a battery or two to guard the retreat. Our people did not call it a retreat, but they did march as indicated.

Now this was as late as 2 o'clock, I think; and I also think that if Porter had continued his march at 11 a. m. when he was going as ordered in the direction of Gainesville, and as he ought to have done and, had he tried, could have done, he would, by going out to the Warrenton and Gainesville pike via Meadowville lane, have been able to arrive there an hour before Longstreet did, and he would thus have carried out his order by connecting with Reynolds, whose line of battle was along the Warrenton and Gainesville pike, his right connecting with Schenck not far west of Groveton, and his left at "J," only a little east of the road on which Porter might have come. As I have before stated, Reynolds was facing north and his left lapped Jackson's right. Had Porter come in as indicated and fronted to the west and made disposition to resist an attack I have no doubt that he would have been able to keep Longstreet from flanking Reynolds. Even if he had not arrived in time to break Jackson's right, he would have made it possible for Reynolds to do so. Reynolds was in the position indicated, with his flank toward Gainesville, until 1 o'clock, when Longstreet came up and forced him to refuse his left, and later to rest his right nearer Groveton, his left out on Lewis's lane, and of course to face west instead of north.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Did not General Grant in his review of this question differ with you on the subject? Did he not say that General Porter acted right?

Mr. STEELE. I have had great men and small men differ with me. I was going on to say——

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. You have not answered my question as to whether General Grant differed with you as to military tactics.

Mr. STEELE. General Grant disagreed with me as to the innocence of Porter late in his life.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Still I ask the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. STEELE. We have not differed because the question has not been up. Porter would have had King's and Ricketts's divisions and Piatt's brigade to support him had he continued his march, and would not have made it necessary for McDowell to go to the right, and with such a force Longstreet would have had all he could attend to, and have been prevented from interfering with the crushing of Jackson. From the time Longstreet arrived, Reynolds had no chance at Jackson. I know gentlemen think that nothing could happen to Jackson, and it seemed to be so; if there was a fortunate man in the world, it was Jackson until he died. He had the audacity of all the commanders of either army——

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The courage, not the audacity.

Mr. STEELE. A man must have courage if he has audacity. Porter, as I said, was disgusted, and instead of making this movement as he ought to have done, went back to Bethlehem church, 2 miles to the rear, and I suppose went into that old forsaken church, and in all probability fell down in its sacred precincts and prayed, and the chief object of his supplication was to be either taken "out of that," or to have "Mack come," and so far as we know he staid in church till late in the afternoon or evening, and when he came out he lay down and took a rest under a tree, probably tired by his supplications. While here, getting his ear down close to the ground, he was able to hear the guns of our people over at or near Groveton (and there had been firing all day). He did not hear much firing, and there was not much firing that day according to Porter. But when he got his ear down he heard something, and sent a message to McDowell and King. It was to this effect: "It seems that Sigel is retreating. Our firing seems to be receding and that of the enemy advancing. I have found it impossible to communicate by crossing the roads to Groveton."

He found it impossible. Griffin had run into the little pine bushes. Griffin did not go on the road near the branch, as he might have done, because Marshall had his skirmishers beyond there all day and night after they marched back from the pine bushes.

There was no trouble for him to have marched over in that direction if he had tried to do so. He says he failed; he does not say he tried to do it, but simply that he failed to do it. He says:

> The enemy are in strong force on this road, and as it appears have driven our forces back. The fire of the enemy has advanced and ours retired. I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I expected to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy. They have gathered artillery and infantry, and advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force.

The moment he thought our firing was receding he was ready to join the command on the retreat—not because he was afraid, but because he was willing to see Pope defeated. No firing there! I have here volume 12, part 2, of the Official Reports of the War of the Rebellion—reports made at the time, from which I propose to read. I must necessarily confine myself to extracts, and of course I need not say to the committee that I read those portions that go to show there was a battle on that day.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] has expired.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I think he has still five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] began at fifty minutes past 2 o'clock.

Mr. STEELE. I think my time is about up.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I make the motion that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done only by unanimous consent. If there be no objection the time of the gentleman will be extended.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. STEELE. I read now from General Sigel's report. He says:

> In this order our whole line advanced from point to point, taking advantage of the ground before us, while our whole line was involved in a most vehement artillery and infantry contest.

This was on the morning of the 29th, covering about four hours, from 6.30 to 10.30; and Porter was along on that road from 9 to 10.30.

In the morning our whole infantry force and nearly all our batteries were engaged with the enemy. Generals Milroy and Schurz advanced 1 mile, and General Schenck 2 miles from their original positions.

And yet my friend who preceded me talks about the roaring of the cannon being heard only on the 30th.

Mr. OATES. What are you reading from?

Mr. STEELE. General Sigel's report.

Mr. OATES. Is he speaking of the time between 6 o'clock and 10 o'clock on the forenoon of the 29th?

Mr. STEELE. Yes. He says, "At this time, 10.30, the enemy threw forward a large mass of infantry." That was undoubtedly when Jackson's men advanced, and I think that in the morning there was heavy skirmishing up to 10.30.

Mr. OATES. There was only skirmishing and artillery firing.

Mr. STEELE. General Sigel says:

At this time, 10.30, the enemy threw forward large masses of infantry against our line, but was resisted firmly and driven back three times by the troops of Milroy and Schurz.

Again:

At this critical moment, when the enemy had almost outflanked us on both wings and was preparing for a new attack on our center, Major-General Kearny arrived.

Scarcely were those troops in position when the contest began with renewed vigor and vehemence, the enemy attacking furiously along our whole line from the extreme right to the extreme left.

During two hours from 4 to 6 p. m.—

Understand I am not attempting to read all that is said about the different engagements through the day—

Heintzelman and Reynolds had both arrived and were engaged in the battle.

During two hours, from 4 to 6 p. m., strong cannonading and musketry continued on our center and right, where General Kearny made a successful effort against the extreme left of the enemy's lines.

At 6.15 o'clock Brigadier-General King's division of Major-General McDowell's corps arrived behind our front and advanced on the Gainesville turnpike. I do not know the real result of this movement, but from the weakness of the enemy's cannonade and the gradually decreasing musketry in the direction of General Kearny's attack I received the impression that the enemy's resistance was broken and that victory was on our side; and so it was. We had won the field of battle, and our army rested near the dead and wounded who had so gloriously defended the good cause of this country.

Schurz, Schenck, and Milroy speak of desperate fighting there, along the railroad cut. Here is where the heaviest fighting occurred on the 29th.

Mr. OATES. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does Sigel's report state that Jackson's forces were attacking them or that they were attacking Jackson's?

Mr. STEELE. Our forces were advancing, striking your skirmishers first and your main line about 10 a. m.

Here is what Schurz, Schenck, and Milroy say.

General C. Schurz, page 299:

However, we succeeded in holding the position of the railroad embankment along my whole front against the repeated attacks of the enemy until about 2 o'clock p. m., when my troops, who had started at 5 o'clock in the morning, mostly without breakfast, had been under fire for eight hours, had been decimated by enormous losses, and had exhausted nearly all their ammunition, were relieved by a number of regiments kindly sent by General Hooker for that purpose.

Brig. Gen. Robert C. Schenck, page 279:

On Friday morning early the engagement was commenced by General Milroy on our right, in which we soon after took part, and a rapid artillery fire ensued from both sides. Colonel McLean advanced around the left of the hill under cover of the woods, pressing gradually forward until he struck the turnpike at a white house about one-half mile in advance of the stone house. General Milroy's brigade arrived about the same time.

We here halted and sent back for General Stahel, who took the pike and soon joined us. We then formed our line of battle in the woods to the left of the pike, our right resting on the road, and then pushed on slowly. Milroy in the mean while had deployed to the right of the road, and soon became engaged with the enemy.

It was about this time (1 or 2 o'clock) that a line of skirmishers were observed approaching us from the rear. They proved to be of General Reynolds's division.* We communicated with General Reynolds at once, who took his position on our left, and at General Schenck's suggestion he sent a battery to our right in the woods for the purpose of flanking the enemy's. They secured a position, and were engaged with him about an hour, but with what result we were not informed. General Reynolds now sent us word that he had discovered the enemy bearing down upon his left in heavy columns, and that he intended to fall back to the first woods behind the cleared space, and had already put his troops in motion. We therefore accommodated ourselves to his movement.

It was about this time that your order came to press toward the right. We returned answer that the enemy were in force in front of us, and that we could not do so without leaving the left much exposed.

Milroy says:

On the following morning (the 29th) at daylight I was ordered to proceed in search of the rebels, and had not proceeded more than 500 yards when we were greeted by a few straggling shots from the woods in front. After passing a piece of woods I turned to the right, where the rebels had a battery that gave us a great deal of trouble. I brought forward one of my batteries to reply to it, and soon after heard a tremendous fire of small-arms, and knew that General Schurz was hotly engaged to my right in an extensive forest. The two regiments sent to Schurz were soon hotly engaged, the enemy being behind a railroad embankment, which afforded them an excellent breastwork.

The railroad had to be approached from the cleared ground on our side through a strip of thick timber from 100 to 500 yards in width. I had intended, with the two regiments held in reserve (the Second and Third Virginia Regiments), to charge the rebel battery, which was but a short distance from us over the top of a hill to our left, but while making my arrangements to do this I observed that my two regiments engaged were being driven back out of the woods by the terrible fire of the rebels.

I then saw the brave Colonels Cantwell and Zeigler struggling to rally their broken regiments on the rear of the forest out of which they had been driven, and sent two of my aides to assist them and assure them of immediate support. They soon rallied their men and charged again and again up to the railroad, but were driven back each time with great loss. I then sent the Second Virginia to their support, directing it to approach the railroad at the point on the left of my other regiments, where the woods ended, but they were met by such a destructive fire from a large rebel force that they were soon thrown into confusion and fell back in disorder. The enemy now came on in overwhelming numbers.

I will not read McDowell's report, but no man believes that he was not a truthful, honest man. Some may doubt whether he had the greatest courage of any man in the world, but I left him ordering Porter into the fight, to advance, and starting for King and Ricketts to take them to the right and to the field. He found King's division at Bethlehem church and Ricketts's where the Manassas and Sudley road leaves the road on which Porter was supposed to be marching to Gainesville, and at once marched them on the Manassas and Sudley road north, making a long halt at New Market or a little north of there, but finally reached the vicinity of the Henry house, and started to take King over to Reynolds's support at Lewis's lane, when he received an order to come back to the Sudley road and march to the stone house on the pike, which he did. Ricketts, reaching the Henry house and having marched from Thoroughfare Gap via Gainesville, Bristoe, and Manassas Junction, is allowed to remain there; but Hatch, with King's division, excepting Gibbon, is ordered to pursue the enemy, it having been reported to Pope that he was fleeing. You will see from the official reports, or extracts of them that I will read, that he had not gone. Hatch marched west to Groveton on the pike, where he encountered Longstreet, prepared to advance instead of retreat, and a furious battle took place, as reports will show, and that there was a great deal of fighting on that day:

No. 28.

Report of Brig. Gen. John P. Hatch, U. S. Army, commanding First Division, of the battles of Groveton and Bull Run.

CAMP NEAR FREDERICK, MD., September 13, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit the following report of the movements of the First Division, Third Corps, temporarily under my command during parts of the 29th and 30th days of August:

Late on the afternoon of the 29th ultimo I was ordered by General McDowell in person (who was at the time stationed near the stone house, on the turnpike from Gainesville to Centreville) to move the division on the Gainesville road in pursuit of the enemy, who, he informed me, were retreating. Gibbon's brigade had been detached to support some batteries. With the three other brigades of the division and Gerrish's battery of howitzers I proceeded with all the speed possible, hoping by harassing the enemy's rear to turn their retreat into a rout.

After marching about three-quarters of a mile the Second Regiment of United States Sharpshooters was deployed to the front as skirmishers, the column continuing up the road in support. The advance almost immediately became warmly engaged on the left of the road. Two howitzers were then placed in position, one on each side of the road, and Doubleday's brigade was deployed to the front, on the left of the road, and moved up to the support of the skirmishers. We were met by a force consisting of three brigades of infantry, one of which was posted in the woods on the left, parallel to and about an eighth of a mile from the road. The two other brigades were drawn up in line of battle, one on each side of the road. These were in turn supported by a large portion of the rebel forces, estimated by a prisoner, who was taken to their rear, at about 30,000 men, drawn up in successive lines, extending 1½ miles to the rear. Doubleday's brigade moved to the front under a very heavy fire, which they gallantly sustained; but the firing continuing very heavy, Hatch's brigade, commanded by Colonel Sullivan, was also deployed, and moved to the support of General Doubleday. Patrick's brigade, which had been held in reserve, took up a position on the opposite side of the road, completely commanding it. The struggle, lasting some three-quarters of an hour, was a desperate one, being in many instances a hand-to-hand conflict.

Night had now come on, our loss had been severe, and the enemy occupying a position in the woods on our left which gave them a flank fire upon us, I was forced to give the order for a retreat. The retreat was executed in good order, the attempt of the enemy to follow being defeated by a few well-directed volleys from Patrick's brigade.

General Reynolds, page 393:

The morning of the 29th closed up with General Sigel's command on the battlefield of Bull Run. General Sigel reported the enemy in his immediate front, and requested my co-operation with him in an attack upon his position. I accordingly formed my division on the left of General Sigel's corps, next to the division of General Schenck. General McDowell joined the command at daylight, and directed my co-operation with General Sigel.

The right of the enemy's position could be discerned upon the heights above Groveton, on the right of the pike. The division advanced over the ground to the heights above Groveton, crossed the pike, and Cooper's battery came gallantly into action on the same ridge on which the enemy's right was, supported by Meade's brigade. While pressing forward our extreme left across the pike reenforcements were sent for by General Sigel for the right of his line, under General Milroy, now hardly pressed by the enemy, and a brigade was taken from Schenck's command on my right. The whole fire of the enemy was now concentrated on the extreme right of my division, and, unsupported there, the battery was obliged to retire, with considerable loss in both men and horses, and the division fell back to connect with Schenck.

Later in the day General Pope, arriving on the right from Centreville, renewed the attack on the enemy and drove him some distance. My division was directed to threaten the enemy's right and rear, which it proceeded to do under a heavy fire of artillery from the ridge to the left of the pike. Generals Seymour and Jackson led their brigades in advance, but notwithstanding all the steadiness and courage shown by the men they were compelled to fall back before the heavy fire of artillery and musketry which met them both on the front and left flank, and the division resumed its original position. King's division engaged the enemy along the pike on our right, and the action was continued with it until dark by Meade's brigade.

General Meade, page 397:

On the 29th the brigade was formed in line of battle on the left of Sigel's corps and directed to move on Gainesville. Sigel, having found the enemy on his front on the other side of the Warrenton pike, engaged them along his whole line, and the brigade moved up on his left until it crossed the Warrenton pike within a half mile of Groveton, at which point Cooper's battery was established on the ridge, with the Fourth, Seventh, and Eighth regiments to support him, the third being posted along the Pike and the Rifles sent up the pike as skirmishers. The enemy, perceiving this disposition, brought several batteries to bear on Cooper's, who, being short of ammunition, was withdrawn, and Ransom's was about being substituted, when it was ascertained that Schenck's division, of Sigel's corps, which had been on our right, was withdrawn, and at the same time the enemy's infantry were deploying in our front in such force as required the withdrawal of the brigade to the other side of the Warrenton pike, where a position was taken on the plateau near what is known as the Lewis house, which overlooks Groveton and the pike leading to it.

*See Reynolds to McDowell, October 9, and Chesebrough to McDowell, October 20, in Appendix C to McDowell's report.

General Heintzelman, page 42:

At 10 a. m. I reached the field of battle, a mile from stone bridge, on the Warrenton turnpike. General Kearny's division had proceeded to the right and front. I learned that General Sigel was in command of the troops then engaged and called on him.

At 11 a. m. the head of Hooker's division arrived; General Reno an hour later. At the request of General Sigel I ordered General Hooker to place one of his brigades at General Sigel's disposal to reinforce a portion of his line then hard pressed. General Grover reported, and before long became engaged, and was afterward supported by the whole division. General Pope arrived between 1 and 2 p. m. The enemy were driven back a short distance toward Sudley church, where they made another stand, and again pressed a portion of our line back. All this time General Kearny's division held its position on our extreme right. Several orders were sent him to advance, but he did not move until after the troops on his left had been forced back, which was near 6 p. m. He now advanced and reported that he was driving the enemy. This was not, however, until after the renewed heavy musketry fire on our center had driven General Hooker's troops and those he was sent to support back. They were greatly outnumbered, and had behaved with exceeding gallantry.

It was on this occasion that General Grover's brigade made the most gallant and determined bayonet charge of the war. He broke two of the enemy's lines, but was finally repulsed by the overwhelming numbers in the rebel third line. It was a hand-to-hand conflict, using the bayonet and the butt of the musket. In this fierce encounter, of not over twenty minutes' duration, the Second New Hampshire, Colonel Marston, suffered the most. The First, Eleventh, and Sixteenth Massachusetts and Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania were engaged. The loss of this brigade, numbering less than two thousand present, was a total of four hundred and eighty-four, nearly all killed and wounded. I refer you to General Grover's accompanying report.

General Grover, page 438:

On the following day we recontinued our march for the plains of Manassas by the way of Centreville, and arrived upon the battlefield about 9 a. m. The battle had already commenced, and as my column moved to the front the shells fell with remarkable precision along the line of the road, but fortunately did no damage. My brigade was temporarily placed under the orders of Major-General Sigel, whose troops were then engaging the enemy in the center. Under instructions received from him I threw forward the First Massachusetts Volunteers to support his line, while my remaining four regiments were drawn up in two lines, sheltered from the enemy's fire by a roll of the field in front. This position was occupied until about 2.30 p. m.

In the mean time I rode over the field in front as far as the position of the enemy would admit. After rising the hill under which my command lay an open field was entered, and from one edge of it gradually fell off in a slope to a valley, through which ran a railroad embankment. Beyond this embankment the forest continued, and the corresponding heights beyond were held by the enemy in force, supported by artillery.

At 3 p. m. I received an order to advance in line of battle over this ground, pass the embankment, enter the edge of the woods beyond, and hold it. Dispositions for carrying out such orders were immediately made. Pieces were loaded, bayonets fixed, and instructions given for the line to move slowly upon the enemy until it felt his fire, then close upon him rapidly, fire one well-directed volley, and rely upon the bayonet to secure the position on the other side.

We rapidly and firmly pressed upon the embankment, and here occurred a short, sharp, and obstinate hand-to-hand conflict with bayonets and clubbed muskets. Many of the enemy were bayoneted in their tracks, others struck down with the butts of pieces, and onward pressed our line. In a few yards more it met a terrible fire from a second line, which in its turn broke. The enemy's third line now bore down upon our thinned ranks in close order, and swept back the right center and a portion of our left. With the gallant Sixteenth Massachusetts on our left I tried to turn his flank, but the breaking of our right and center and the weight of the enemy's lines caused the necessity of falling back, first to the embankment and then to our first position, behind which we rallied to our colors.

In this fierce encounter of not more than twenty minutes' duration our loss was as follows:

Command.	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
First Massachusetts Volunteers	5	66	7	78
Second New Hampshire Volunteers	16	87	30	133
Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteers	10	77	25	112
Sixteenth Massachusetts Volunteers	4	64	42	110
Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers	6	33	14	53
	41	327	118	486

Though forced to retire from the field by the immensely superior numbers of the enemy, supported by artillery and by the natural strength of his position, men never fought more gallantly or efficiently.

General Nelson Taylor, page 445:

Having everything in readiness, I gave the order to advance. The line had advanced but a few steps when the left was struck with such violence by a regiment (which continued the line to the left) which had broken that the Second Excelsior Regiment, which was on the left of the brigade line, was almost carried away with it. Seeing the confusion, I rode hastily to this part of the line, accompanied by my two aids, Lieutenants Tremain and Dwight, and endeavored to stay this disgraceful retreat, but it was in vain; the tide could not be stemmed. On they rushed over and through my line perfectly panic-stricken, breaking and carrying away with them the left of my line. The enemy, seeing this, charged after them. I then endeavored to throw back my line to give the enemy a flank fire. This I found on trial impracticable, the wood being too dense to execute the movement. By this time the enemy had availed themselves of a large interval opened on my left and poured through in large numbers, and had got fifty or sixty paces in my rear, giving the line an enfilading and reverse fire. They, however, soon ceased firing, as they were so mixed up as to endanger their own men; they then commenced taking prisoners. Finding my line completely flanked and turned, and in danger of being entirely cut off, I give the order to fall back, which was done in as good order as could be, situated as we were.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me ask you one question. You are now undertaking to demonstrate that there was fighting going on between the troops under Pope and those under Jackson?

Mr. STEELE. I am demonstrating that fighting was going on between the troops of Pope and Jackson and Longstreet, if you would have it so. I am going to show before I get through that there was a battle on the 29th.

Mr. WHEELER. You admit that Porter was three miles from Jackson's right? All the evidence states that.

Mr. STEELE. Well, his troops were close to three miles from Jackson's right, and he was farther away, but his head of column was not that far from Longstreet's right.

Mr. WHEELER. Then you contend that Porter, with nine thousand men, should have attacked Longstreet with twenty-five thousand, while General Pope, with sixty thousand, was attacking about half the number?

Mr. STEELE. The evidence is very conclusive that Porter, so far from knowing anything about Longstreet, had lain in the shade here by the church all day without attempting to find any force of the enemy, if Longstreet or any other force was where he could attack him.

Mr. WHEELER. You do not answer my question.

Mr. STEELE. I have answered it.

Mr. WHEELER. No.

Mr. STEELE. I do not care how you put that matter. I do contend that Porter ought to have made an attack some place; but whether that be so or not, when he heard this cannonading, this firing going on, and knew that his comrades were pressed, if he had had the first instinct of a soldier or had not hated Pope so much he would have made an endeavor to get over there and find out what was going on. He did not know that Longstreet was here to his right front. The first move made by Longstreet to get into position was to march down on his left of the Warrenton pike, and Laws says that his left connected with Jackson's right. Reynolds, who was in line of battle from near Groveton to "J," facing Jackson's exposed right flank, said there were no confederate troops across the pike until after 1 o'clock. Porter should have been there before that hour. Jeb Stuart, arriving at the Carrico house, asked for some troops and batteries, and Longstreet sent Kemper, Wilcox, and Jones. Jones's brigade was across Manassas and Gainesville Railroad, and the right of Jones was not as far to the right as Porter was; that is, Porter's left extended farther south. Jones was across the railroad, to the right and front of the Carrico house, facing east.

Mr. WHEELER. You stated early in your speech that McDowell and Porter met a courier coming from Gainesville——

Mr. STEELE. No; Morell met the courier.

Mr. WHEELER. Morell met a courier coming from Gainesville with a dispatch from Buford saying seventeen regiments had passed there.

Mr. STEELE. No, sir; I did not speak of any dispatch from Buford, and he did not come from Gainesville on the road on which Porter was halting, but on one you will see on the map leading southeast via Bristoe and Manassas Junction, where he reported to McDowell about D. R. Jones having arrived at Gainesville. Jones waited at Gainesville or near there until Longstreet came up, and was not sent to near the Carrico house or put into position until after Laws had been placed in position connecting with Jackson's left.

There was not more than one brigade across the railroad to the right. If Porter had desired to do, by throwing his left forward he could have marched up in the direction of and struck Longstreet's right at any time that day—after Longstreet got in position, of course.

But I contend he should have been in position on Meadowville lane, and he would have been there if he had marched with some alacrity before Longstreet's column could have arrived. He had only marched from Bristoe, a little over 8 miles, and had arrived at half past 10 or 11 o'clock at Dawkin's Branch. He had received an order between daylight and sunrise, Morell says.

Mr. OATES. Does the gentleman contend that any of Longstreet's troops, except two brigades, were engaged that day?

Mr. STEELE. I think that only two of Hood's brigades were furiously engaged. There had been more or less firing between his troops and those of Reynolds after his arrival that afternoon and in the evening when Hood charged on both sides of the Warrenton pike, with three brigades; Hunton, of Kemper's command, advanced on his right and came in contact with Reynolds, but did not go far enough to strike his main line, and Longstreet's artillery engaged ours for several hours that afternoon. But I must continue. Had Porter, instead of halting at this hour, continued his march he would have had at least two hours in which to have marched 2 miles and taken position, and, I think, one he could have held long enough to have given us a victory.

He had four hours, from 9 o'clock, when he received the order, to 1 o'clock, to move about 5½ miles—not to exceed 6. He had four hours in which to move before the enemy was seen by Reynolds, and before Reynolds's line fell back on its right.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to give a little testimony which is perhaps more satisfactory to some of my friends on the other side.

GENERAL LEE'S REPORT.

Generals Jones and Wilcox bivouacked that night east of the mountains, and on the morning of the 29th the whole command resumed the march, the sound of cannon at Manassas announcing that Jackson was already engaged. Longstreet entered the turnpike near Gainesville, and moving down toward Groveton, the head of his column came upon the field in rear of the enemy's left, which had already opened with artillery upon Jackson's right, as previously described. He immediately placed some of his batteries in position, but before he could complete his disposition to attack the enemy withdrew, not, however, without loss from our artillery. Longstreet took position on the right of Jackson, Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, being deployed across the turnpike and at right angles to it. These troops were supported on the left by three brigades under General Wilcox and by a like force on the right under General Kemper. D. R. Jones's division formed the extreme right of the line, resting on the Manassas Gap Railroad. The cavalry guarded our right and left flanks, that on the right being under General Stuart in person.

After the arrival of Longstreet the enemy changed his position and began to concentrate opposite Jackson's left, opening a brisk artillery fire, which was responded to with effect by some of General A. P. Hill's batteries. Colonel Walton placed a part of his artillery upon a commanding position between the lines of Generals Jackson and Longstreet by order of the latter, and engaged the enemy vigorously for several hours. Soon afterward General Stuart reported the approach of a large force from the direction of Bristoe Station, threatening Longstreet's right. The brigades under General Wilcox were sent to re-enforce General Jones, but no serious attack was made, and, after firing a few shots, the enemy withdrew. While this demonstration was being made on our right a large force advanced to assail the left of Jackson's position, occupied by the division of General A. P. Hill. The attack was received by his troops with their accustomed steadiness, and the battle raged with great fury. The enemy was repeatedly repulsed, but again pressed on to the attack with fresh troops. Once he succeeded in penetrating an interval between General Gregg's brigade, on the extreme left, and that of General Thomas, but was quickly driven back with great slaughter by the Fourteenth South Carolina Regiment, then in reserve, and the Forty-ninth Georgia, of Thomas's brigade. The contest was close and obstinate, the combatants sometimes delivering their fire at ten paces.

General Gregg, who was most exposed, was re-enforced by Hays's brigade, under Colonel Forno, and successfully and gallantly resisted the attacks of the enemy until, the ammunition of his brigade being exhausted and all his field officers but two killed or wounded, it was relieved, after several hours of severe fighting, by Early's brigade and the Eighth Louisiana Regiment. General Early drove the enemy back with heavy loss and pursued about 200 yards beyond the line of battle, when he was recalled to the position on the railroad where Thomas, Pender, and Archer had firmly held their ground against every attack. While the battle was raging on Jackson's left General Longstreet ordered Hood and Evans to advance, but before the order could be obeyed Hood was himself attacked, and his command at once became warmly engaged. General Wilcox was recalled from the right and ordered to advance on Hood's left, and one of Kemper's brigades, under Colonel Hunton, moved forward on his right. The enemy was repulsed by Hood after a severe contest and fell back, closely followed by our troops.

The battle continued until 9 p. m., the enemy retreating until he reached a strong position, which he held with a large force. The darkness of the night put a stop to the engagement, and our troops remained in their advanced position until early next morning, when they were withdrawn to their first line. One piece of artillery, several stands of colors, and a number of prisoners were captured.

Our loss was severe in this engagement. Brigadier-Generals Field and Tremble, and Colonel Forno, commanding Hays's brigade, were severely wounded, and several other valuable officers killed or disabled, whose names are mentioned in the accompanying reports.

On the morning of the 30th the enemy again advanced and skirmishing began along the line.

Mr. OATES. That is the battle of the 28th?

Mr. STEELE. No; the 29th. That was the evening of the 29th. Longstreet confirms this.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment? The reports from which the gentleman reads purport to cover the operations of several days, and are not confined to any one day.

Mr. STEELE. All of this has reference to the battle of the 29th of August; the dates show it. I am aware that the whole report covers the operations of other days; but I only read as to the 29th, and all I read may be found in volume 12, part 2, War of the Rebellion, which is made up, as you are aware, from official records.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes; but the gentleman will find that the report, as made, covers the operations of several days.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, yes; some of the reports from day to day; but I only read what refers to the battle of the 29th of August.

Mr. BRAGG. For instance, the death of General Trimble, to which reference is made in that report, took place on the 28th in our front.

Mr. OATES. I was in his brigade, and know that to be so.

Mr. STEELE. I think you are right, and that General Trimble was killed on the evening of the 28th, quite after dark, and General Lee probably had not heard when he was killed, and at some time, remembering his death when making up his report, made mention of it; but there is nothing else in his report as to this day that leads one to think he did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. OATES. What the gentleman has been reading is a consolidation of all the reports covering the operations during the whole of that period.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But it covers the operations of each day separately.

Mr. STEELE. And the report tells especially of the operations of the 29th, because a battle, and a hard one, was fought.

The gentleman on the other side will not deny this testimony that the soldiers were bayoneted in their tracks. I wish my friend from Alabama to bear me out as to the terrible fight on the railroad, where Grover went in.

Mr. BRAGG. Whose report is that the gentleman reads from?

Mr. STEELE. Lee's. I will read further what he says.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will allow me I will tell him what I saw, as I happened to be on that line that evening.

Mr. STEELE. Let me tell the gentleman before he tells me that he will admit it would be impossible for him to find where he was immediately after the battle, except the railroad embankment marked his position. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON], whom I do not see in his seat, was with me on the battle-ground the other day, and he tried hard to find the position he occupied during the fight. He was shot down and staid there a long time, but he was utterly unable to find his position. I wish only to say that it is not uncommon for soldiers to go back to the battlefield and be mistaken about the ideas they had of their locality.

Mr. OATES. I will only state what I know.

Mr. STEELE. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. As to the fighting on the evening of Friday, 29th of August, I will say my regiment was the right of the second brigade. Stark's Louisiana brigade was the right of our line, behind this railroad embankment.

Mr. STEELE. Where was that?

Mr. OATES. That was our right.

Mr. STEELE. Jackson's right?

Mr. OATES. Stark's Louisiana brigade was the right. Then there was a gap. There was no embankment thrown up perhaps for 100 or 150 yards. We had no line along that gap. I was in Trimble's brigade. My regiment was the right one, and we lay along there. There were some troops stationed back here in the woods. Two assaults were made along this line, and one brigade got right up to this embankment and clambered up upon the side of it. There was a large number of white stones there, which were used as weapons by both sides, and the fighting was very severe. I saw right on the top of this embankment the colors of both sides waving together. It was a hand-to-hand fight, and a very desperate one.

Mr. STEELE. I hope the gentlemen will listen; they will see that there was a battle.

Mr. OATES. One officer commanding at this point led his command right up, making a charge to the very top of this embankment, and he and his horse were both killed there. After that attack was repulsed, these troops were replaced by others, and many other attacks were made by about a brigade front passing through a gap between the left of our line and Ewell's division, attacking a portion of A. P. Hill's command, which had formed behind the crest of a hill in line of brigade front. He would advance a brigade forward, meet the attacking force, and these assaults were accompanied by a great deal of noise, musketry, and confusion, and quite a large number of men were killed and wounded, very large in proportion to the numbers actually engaged. I, myself, went over the ground afterward, and was surprised at the number killed.

That fight was in the evening. It was not a battle all along the line, but about a brigade front, or, perhaps, the front of two brigades at a time, and was very destructive for the numbers engaged.

Mr. STEELE. But there was fighting all along the line.

Mr. OATES. There were several assaults on our right as far as Ewell's division extended. How much further the assaults extended I do not know, not having been able to see beyond our own line at this point. I could not, therefore, state from personal knowledge what took place beyond our own front.

Mr. STEELE. Now, if fifteen or sixteen other gentlemen from his side of the House would come forward and confirm the statement of the gentleman from Alabama that there was in fact a battle on the 29th, the argument might cease at this point.

Gentlemen know very well the difficulty that a soldier would have in picking out the position that he occupied unless there was some marked characteristic in the ground to show him his place. As my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON], whom I now see, has said, he could not find his position, for the gentleman had no line to mark it as the gentleman from Alabama has in the present instance.

And I want my friend and colleague on the committee, General WHEELER, to hear what Longstreet says:

Early on the 29th the columns were united and the advance to join General Jackson was resumed. The noise of battle was heard before we reached Gainesville. The march was quickened to the extent of our capacity. The excitement of battle seemed to give new life and strength to our jaded men, and the head of my column soon reached a position in rear of the enemy's left flank and within easy cannon-shot. On approaching the field some of Brigadier-General Hood's batteries were ordered into position, and his division was deployed on the right and left of the turnpike at right angles with it, and supported by Brigadier-General Evans's brigade. Before these batteries could open the enemy discovered our movements and withdrew his left. Another battery (Captain Stribling's) was placed upon a commanding position to my right, which played upon the rear of the enemy's left and drove him entirely from that part of the field. He changed his front rapidly, so as to meet the advance of Hood and Evans. Three brigades, under General Wilcox, were thrown forward to the support of the left, and three others, under General Kemper, to the support of the right of these commands.

General D. R. Jones's division was placed upon the Manassas Gap Railroad to the right and en échelon with regard to the three last brigades. Colonel Walton placed his batteries in a commanding position between my line and that of General Jackson, and engaged the enemy for several hours in a severe and successful artillery duel. At a late hour in the day Major-General Stuart reported the approach of the enemy in heavy columns against my extreme right. I withdrew General Wilcox, with his three brigades, from the left and placed his command in position to support Jones in case of an attack against my right. After some few shots the enemy withdrew his forces, moving them around toward his front, and about 4 o'clock in the afternoon began to press forward against General Jackson's position. Wilcox's brigades were moved back to their former position, and Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, were quickly pressed forward to the attack. At the same time Wilcox's three brigades made a like advance, as also Hunton's brigade, of Kemper's command. These movements were executed with commendable zeal and ability. Hood, supported by Evans, made a gallant attack, driving the enemy back until 9 o'clock at night. One piece of artillery, several regimental standards, and a number of prisoners were taken. The enemy's entire force was found to be massed directly in my front, and in so strong a position that it was not deemed advisable to move on against his immediate front; so the troops were quietly withdrawn at 1 o'clock the following morning. The wheels of the captured piece were cut down and it was left on the ground.

General Jackson, 645:

The next morning (29th) I found that he had abandoned the ground occupied as the battlefield the evening before and had moved farther to the east and to my left, placing himself between my command and the Federal capital. My troops on this day were distributed along and in the vicinity of the cut of an unfinished railroad (intended as a part of the track to connect the Manassas road directly with Alexandria), stretching from the Warrenton turnpike in the direction of Sudley's mill. It was mainly along the excavation of this unfinished road that my line of battle was formed on the 29th—Jackson's division under Brigadier-General Starke, on the right, Ewell's division, under Brigadier-General Lawton, in the center, and Hill's division on the left.

In the morning, about 10 o'clock, the Federal artillery opened with spirit and animation upon our right, which was soon replied to by the batteries of Poague, Carpenter, Dement, Brockenbrough, and Latimer, under Major [L. M.] Shumaker. This lasted for some time, when the enemy moved around more to our left to another point of attack. His next effort was directed against our left. This was vigorously repulsed by the batteries of Braxton, Crenshaw, and Pegram.

About 2 p. m. the Federal infantry in large force advanced to the attack of our left occupied by the division of General Hill. It pressed forward in defiance of our fatal and destructive fire with great determination, a portion of it crossing a deep cut in the railroad track and penetrating in heavy force an interval of nearly 175 yards which separated the right of Gregg's from the left of Thomas's brigade. For a short time Gregg's brigade, on the extreme left, was isolated from the main body of the command; but the Fourteenth South Carolina Regiment, then in reserve, with the Forty-ninth Georgia, left of Colonel Thomas, attacked the exultant enemy with vigor and drove them back across the railroad track with great slaughter. General McGowen reports that the opposing forces at one time delivered their volleys into each other at the distance of 10 paces. Assault after assault was made on the left, exhibiting on the part of the enemy great pertinacity and determination, but every advance was most successfully and gallantly driven back.

General Hill reports that six separate and distinct assaults were thus met and repulsed by his division, assisted by Hays's brigade, Colonel Forno commanding. By this time the brigade of General Gregg, which from its position on the extreme left was most exposed to the enemy's attack, had nearly expended its ammunition. It had suffered severely in its men, and all its field officers except two were killed or wounded. About 4 o'clock it had been assisted by Hays's brigade (Colonel Forno). It was now retired to the rear to take some repose after seven hours of severe service, and General Early's brigade of Ewell's division, with the Eighth Louisiana Regiment, took its place. On reaching his position General Early found that the enemy had obtained possession of the railroad and a piece of wood in front, there being at this point a deep cut, which furnished a strong defense. Moving through a field he advanced upon the enemy, drove them from the wood and railroad cut with great slaughter, and followed in pursuit some 200 yards; the Thirteenth Georgia at the same time advanced to the railroad and crossed with Early's brigade. As it was not desirable to bring on a general engagement that evening General Early was recalled to the railroad, where Thomas, Pender, and Archer had firmly maintained their positions during the day. Early kept his position there until the following morning.

Brigadier-General Field and Colonel Forno (commanding Hays's brigade) were severely wounded. Brigadier-General Trimble was also seriously wounded.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You have been reading from Longstreet's report?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir; and all these reports show the distinct engagements, and that there was a battle on the 29th. I desire to call your attention now, and I should like every man who intends to vote on this case to give attention to what I say.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me understand the gentleman. The object of all this argument——

Mr. STEELE. Is to show there was a battle on the 29th.

Mr. WHEELER. And that Porter should have attacked Longstreet under the joint order?

Mr. CUTCHEON. With or without the order.

Mr. STEELE. As I said a while ago, if McClellan had been fighting here Porter would have got to him even through that little thick pine brush. But he did not attempt to obey the order, and there is no evidence of a single reconnoissance being made by him on that day; and there is evidence he had three distinct orders that ought to have impelled him to go forward and attack the enemy. First, there was the order to take King and march to Gainesville. Second, there was the joint order which only confirmed the first one. Third, there was the order where McDowell told him to put his men in there. Every single one of those orders, aside from his sense of justice and duty as a soldier, ought to have impelled him to attack the enemy.

Mr. WHEELER. Then you insist General McDowell ordered him as he left the field to attack Longstreet?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. You put, then, on McDowell the responsibility of ordering Porter with nine thousand men to attack twenty-five thousand.

Mr. STEELE. Neither McDowell nor any one else on that side knew that Longstreet had twenty-five thousand men. There is no evidence to show a reconnoissance was made, and there is no evidence that so far as Porter's command was concerned they knew of more than a few skirmishers, whom they could see occasionally through the brush. If they had gone on and found Longstreet in such force Porter could at least have created a diversion with his nine thousand men if nothing more. But whether McDowell did this or not is not a matter of any moment.

In the evening Porter received this order while lying under a shade tree—this 4.30 order. He was lying on his elbow, and did not get up when he read it:

AUGUST 29—4.30 p. m.

MAJOR-GENERAL PORTER: Your line of march brings you on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Sykes was sitting there by him, and Sykes says, "I did not know the contents of the order." If he had had the success of his commander at heart, he would have said, "Sykes, here is an important order; get your men ready. Your men are strung along the road from Bethlehem church to Dawkin's Branch, and are not in line of battle as they ought to be; Sykes get your men ready, prepare for an attack And you, Monteith, go up and tell Morrell to get his troops ready." But he said to Monteith, "Go and tell Morell to advance two regiments and attack the enemy in his front, supported by two other regiments." That is the kind of order he gave for an attack. Monteith went and told Morell to do that. Morell asked, "What do you think of it, Marshall?" Marshall said it was dangerous; "The enemy have been moving down in this direction to our right front all day; there are a great many men there, and we had better not attack."

About that time Griffin came up and asked Morell what he was going to do about it. Griffin and Warren were marching in retreat from Dawkin's Branch, after sending word to King, when they met Montieth carrying the order to Morell to attack. Then Griffin faced about and marched and Warren followed, so as to support the movement he supposed was to be made. In reply to Griffin, Morell said it was too late. Griffin and Warren were marching to the rear, no doubt in accordance with Porter's intention, indicated in the following note, to withdraw to Manassas:

Generals McDOWELL and KING:

I found it impossible to communicate by crossing the roads to Groveton. The enemy are in strong force on this road, and as they appear to have driven our forces back, the firing of the enemy having advanced and ours retired, I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I have attempted to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy. They have gathered artillery and cavalry and infantry, and the advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force. I am now going to the head of the column to see what is passing and how affairs are going. Had you not better send your train back?

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

I will communicate with you.

Morell decided that he would not attack with two regiments, and sent Monteith back to say so, and soon afterward received word, "Morell, put your men in camp, prepared to remain till to-morrow;" and skirmishers were put out so that they might not be surprised, and they lay there until the morning of the 30th. In the morning early Porter received an order, while still at Bethlehem church, from Pope:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA, IN THE FIELD,
Near Bull Run, Va., August 29, 1862—8.50 p. m.

GENERAL: Immediately upon receipt of this order, the precise hour of receiving which you will acknowledge, you will march your command to the field of battle of to-day and report to me in person for orders. You are to understand that you are expected to comply strictly with this order, and to be present on the field within three hours after its reception or after daybreak to-morrow morning.

JNO. POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

He received that order in the morning at 3 o'clock, and as it was an order which could not be misinterpreted decided to move and report to Pope, which he did about 9 o'clock. He made 4 miles in six hours with a part of his command, after he received the order. Morell, with Griffin's brigade, instead of turning north on the Manassas and Sudley road and following Sykes's division and his other brigade, marched via Manassas Station to Centreville, and Piatt followed them to Centreville; but hearing the sound of battle about 4 or 5 miles off, at about Henry House, Groveton, and Sudley Ford, marched in that direction. Griffin, late in the evening, moved out to the stone bridge, and Morell a little earlier to join his other brigade on the battlefield. I am speaking of the 30th, and to show that with the peremptory order in hand he did not obey it with spirit or he would have said to Piatt, "Follow with your troops my corps when we have cleared the road," and he would have left a staff officer at the Sudley road to show Griffin the route he had taken, with orders to follow him.

Porter came up and put his troops in front of Sigel, facing the old railroad embankment, but did not advance to attack or fire a gun until 3½ o'clock, and then he had not been in half as long as Schurz or Kearny or Hooker until he was forced back. Yet this fight, with about seven thousand men, is called a battle—I suppose because Porter was there. Sigel, who fought on that day, was with him; Reynolds fought with him that day; King fought with him that day; Ricketts fought with him that day. He marched one brigade to the front and supported it by Sykes with the regulars. Sigel had lost a thousand men the day before right where Porter went in and was driven back.

In the mean time Longstreet, who had had his right resting at the right, and front of Carrico house, and his left on Jackson's right, made a left wheel and had moved over the identical ground that laid between Porter and Reynolds (and which Porter found it impossible to get through or over on account of the little pine brushes on the 29th), so that his new line bending back in center was away around close to the Henry house, and had driven Reynolds's and Sigel's left before him. Our troops were still in front of the railroad cut and Warren had a brigade here of two regiments near Groveton, and the artillery of Jackson and Longstreet mowed down nearly half his men. Porter was forced back and Sykes moved back to about the Henry house, and moved to position after position, and, finally, late in the evening they moved back and left the field, and his were not the rear troops.

I want to call attention to another point which I think is very important. We measure battles by the number of killed and wounded. The compiler of this war history says that the loss of Sigel was imperfectly ascertained, and believed to be greater than reported—he does not know it exactly, but it was reported at over two thousand; and that his loss was principally on the first day can not be controverted. His reports show it. Heintzelman was engaged on the 29th and he lost over nineteen hundred men. Reno was engaged on the 29th and he lost over fifteen hundred men on that day. Porter was engaged on the 30th and he lost twenty-one hundred men. Heintzelman, who lost nineteen hundred men, and Reno, who lost over fifteen hundred men, were not engaged the next day. Their losses together were over fourteen hundred men more than Porter's loss. Therefore I say if we measure battles by the number of killed, it appears, so far as these two corps are concerned, saying nothing about Sigel, King, or Reynolds, that their losses on the 29th were much greater than Porter's on the 30th. Therefore I take it that gentlemen who think there was no battle on the 29th are laboring under a mistake, and that General Grant—peace to his ashes and all honor to him—was led to make a mistake in thinking there was no battle that day. "Well, but," you say, "Terry and Schofield and Getty acquitted Porter." So they did, but how?

In the first place, Porter had three as eminent lawyers as there are in this country to take charge of his case. Then they had the selection of the jury, of the court, which meant Schofield, for he was the whole court. All honor to General Terry. He is a brave, conscientious, able, and learned man. I have not a word to say against him or General Getty. But you can see by examining the testimony that Schofield took charge. Another thing: the Government made no provision whatever for getting witnesses. It did not pay a witness a dollar, and it was represented by only one newly-appointed judge-advocate, who had charge of the Government side of the case, but he ably did his duty. Evidence, cost what it might, and whatever might be its character, Porter's side were bound to have if they could get it, and they got it and used it. The Government's side had no opportunity to bring witnesses. They had no authority, as they say themselves, to administer oaths, but they did so, because Schofield said he thought there would be a little more solemnity about it if they administered an oath to the witnesses, and those who did not know enough to know to the contrary may have thought such an oath was binding.

Mr. WHEELER. Was not Pope a good witness for his side of the question?

Mr. STEELE. Have I said anything about Pope being a witness?

Mr. WHEELER. Was not Pope summoned by Porter?

Mr. STEELE. He was not. On Porter's side they wanted him there very much, but they wanted the Government to summon him. He was not there.

Now, to my friends on the other side I would say, there should be no politics in this matter. If we shall have war hereafter it will be in a common cause; and we shall march with you shoulder to shoulder. It is the good of our common cause that we are looking for. Ten days after you laid down your arms in 1865, if an invitation had been given to you and to the soldiers of our side to march upon foreign territory we would have marched shoulder to shoulder. We should do it if war should come again. Let us not say by our action in disapproving the sentence of Porter that we want any man of his kind to command when our country's safety is in danger. Let us by our votes say to our sons and to our sons' sons, "When you receive an order as a military officer, obey it, though it cost you your life." Let us say to our sons' sons, "Without an order, if you hear the sound of battle, move on to the succor of your countrymen; move on to the succor of your companions in arms, whether directed to do so by your commanding officer or not." [Applause.]

Mr. STEELE here yielded the floor.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRAGG. Is it not as grave a blunder on the part of a subordinate commander to precipitate an action before the lines are formed and preparation made for battle as it is not to engage in battle at the proper time?

Mr. STEELE. Ah! my friend, we had a line of battle, and the numbers that were left on the field attested that it was a great line of battle [applause]; and the gentleman for whom you speak did not even make a reconnaissance so that he might inform himself as to whether his comrades were being pressed or not, or whether he could help them. He formed no line of battle, as my friend from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] suggests.

Mr. BRAGG. Allow me to suggest in reply to what has been said, that those who were not there know very much more about it than those who were.

Mr. STEELE. In reply to that, I would remind the gentleman that I have read the reports of officers on each side who were there—of as distinguished soldiers as ever did battle for any cause.

Mr. PETERS. And those on this side of the House who were there corroborate Mr. STEELE.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. EDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration, by special order, the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. DIBBLE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ a messenger for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds until the end of the present fiscal year, with compensation at the rate of $1,000 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PINDAR, for six days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. MILLS, until further notice, on account of illness.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPRIGGS (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMMOND). The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 193) for the relief of John Hollins McBlair.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas John Hollins McBlair, late a first lieutenant in the Fifteenth United States Infantry, was, by order of the President dated October 6, 1863, wholly retired from the service, and was afterward, on April 8, 1864, ordered by the President to be retired for disability incident to the service and to be placed upon the retired-list, and has ever since been borne upon such retired-list up to November 12, 1884, and has been regularly paid as such retired officer up to April 30, 1884, and the Court of Claims has recently decided that the order of the President of April 8, 1864, attempting to revoke the order of October 6, 1863, wholly retiring him, and to restore him to the retired-list, was not operative: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army by promotion in the line are hereby suspended for the purposes of this act only, and only so far as they affect John Hollins McBlair; and the President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said John Hollins McBlair, late a first lieutenant in the Fifteenth United States Infantry Regiment, to the same grade and rank of first lieutenant in the Army of the United States in the infantry service, and to place him upon the retired-list of the Army as of the date of April 8, 1864, with the pay of his grade and rank from April 30, 1884, and with a full discharge from all liability for any sums paid to or received by him previously to said date.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, the report is quite long, and I think that perhaps a simple statement will put the House in possession of all the material facts and save considerable time. The report is several pages long.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should like to hear the report, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if the report is read it will be counted as in the time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. SPRINGER. I prefer that the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. While the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has the floor he can have the report read as part of his remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I take the floor now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan in charge of the bill [Mr. CUTCHEON] has the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] insists upon having the report read, I will yield to him for that purpose. I do not desire to have the reading come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] still desire to have the report read?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

The report (by Mr. CUTCHEON) was read, as follows:

In the Forty-eighth Congress a bill for the relief of said McBlair was referred to the Senate Military Committee, and by that committee referred to the Secretary of War, and the following letter, with a statement of the services of Lieutenant McBlair and a report of the Adjutant-General in regard to his case, received:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, June 12, 1884.

SIR: The Department duly received your letter of the 27th ultimo, inclosing a copy of S. 2233, "A bill for the relief of Lieut. John Hollins McBlair," and requesting to be furnished with a record of his services in the Army, and of his discharge or dismissal therefrom, giving all the proceedings and any subsequent application for reappointment or restoration made by him, &c.

In reply, I have the honor to invite attention to the inclosed report of the Adjutant-General, dated the 7th instant, and its accompanying papers, which it is believed afford the desired information in the case.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance, and Acting Secretary of War.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
Of the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 7, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the letter of May 27, 1884, from Hon. F. M. COCKRELL, of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, who incloses Senate bill 2233, authorizing the President to "appoint John Hollins McBlair a first lieutenant in the Army, and to restore him to the retired-list as of the date he has heretofore borne on said list," with request for information of record in the case, and a statement of the reasons, if any exist, why the bill should become a law.

First Lieut. John H. McBlair, Fifteenth United States Infantry, was, upon the finding and recommendation of a retiring board, wholly retired from the service, by direction of the President, October 6, 1863, for incapacity reported by the board to be not incident to the service, under the provision of section 17, act of August 3, 1861, and the vacancy thus created was filled. Subsequently the President, upon a review of the case, directed that the order wholly retiring Lieutenant McBlair be revoked, and that his name be placed on the retired-list, to date October 6, 1863. This was done by an order of April 9, 1864, six months after being wholly retired, since which date the name of Lieutenant McBlair has been, and is still, borne upon the Army records and register as a first lieutenant, retired.

It appears that this officer recently presented a claim for arrears of longevity pay; that in the consideration of this claim by the accounting officers of the Treasury the question as to whether or not he was legally restored to the Army by the President's order of revocation of April 9, 1864, was referred by the Treasury Department to the Court of Claims, and that the court has decided, in effect, that Lieutenant McBlair was not legally restored. I inclose herewith a statement of Lieutenant McBlair's military service; a printed copy of the decision of the Court of Claims, above referred to, in which will be found the finding of the retiring board, the orders of retirement and revocation, the indorsement of President Lincoln upon which the order of revocation was based, &c.

It is proper to add that this office has not received orders to drop Lieutenant McBlair from the register.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, June 7, 1884.

Statement of the military service of John H. McBlair, jr., of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office.

He was appointed first lieutenant Fifteenth United States Infantry May 14, 1861.

He served with his regiment at Newport Barracks, Ky., from July, 1861, to September, 1861; was en route to and in the field in the Department of the Ohio to October, 1861, and sick with regiment to November 18, 1861; on sick-leave and surgeon's certificate of disability to June 13, 1862; on duty in the office of the Commissary-General of Subsistence to some time in August, 1863, when ordered before retiring board in New York city.

He was wholly retired on account of incapacity for active service in the field, said incapacity not resulting from any incident of service, by paragraph 12, Special Orders No. 447, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, October 6, 1863. This order was revoked, and he was retired for disability resulting from long and faithful service, or some injury incident thereto, to date October 6, 1863, by paragraph 34, Special Orders No. 143, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, April 9, 1864.

He was on duty in the office of the Commissary-General of Subsistence from May 20, 1864, to April 1, 1866; unemployed to May 4, 1866; on duty as acting aide-de-camp on the staff of General Howard, Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, from May 5, 1866, to December 31, 1868, and on duty at the headquarters of that bureau to February 21, 1870; since the latter date he has not been employed on any military duty.

R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

The opinion of the Court of Claims referred to in the report of the Adjutant-General is as follows:

OPINION.

Weldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The claimant was appointed first lieutenant in the Army on the 14th day of May, 1861, and in September, 1863, was examined by a retiring board organized under the provisions of the act of August 3, 1861. Said board made the following report as the result of its examination:

"After mature deliberation and careful consideration of his case, the board find that First Lieut. J. H. McBlair, jr., Fifteenth United States Infantry, is incapacitated for active service, and that his incapacity does not result from any incident of the service, and the board recommend that he be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay and allowance."

And thereupon the President, on the 6th of October, A. D. 1863, directed—

"That he be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay and allowance, and that his name be henceforth omitted from the Army Register."

November 28, 1863, the President during the recess of the Senate promoted William H. Heilman first lieutenant, to take effect from the 3d day of October, vice McBlair retired. December 31, 1863, the President nominated said Heilman to be first lieutenant from October 3, 1863, vice McBlair retired.

April 8, 1864, the President revoked the order made on the 6th of October, 1863, and directed that the claimant be placed on the "retired-list as of the date at which he was dropped." On the 9th of April the name of the claimant was placed on the retired-list of that class in which the disability results from long and faithful service, or some injury incident thereto, to date October 6, 1863.

On the 1st of July, 1864, the President issued to Heilman a commission as first lieutenant to rank from the 1st day of October, 1863, he having been confirmed by the Senate on the 18th of April, 1864. Since April 8, 1864, the claimant has been borne on the retired-list of the Army as first lieutenant. From May 1, 1864, to 1870 he was detailed to perform active duty in the Commissary and Freedman's Bureau.

The above statement of facts presents the substance of the claim as made by the findings of the court; and although cases almost identical have been decided at the present term, it may not be unprofitable to present further considerations in support of the conclusions of law reached in this and former adjudications. We are called upon in this claim to determine the power of the President over the record of a case in which he has approved the finding of a retiring board by wholly retiring the officer from the Army and the nomination and appointment of his successor.

We may approach the decision of the question presented by this record without the apprehension that there is danger of an invasion of the constitutional prerogative of the President to command the Army, and without the fear that the effect of any decision we may render can in any just sense interfere with the efficiency of the Executive in the administration of his office in the regulation of the Army of the United States.

The right of the President to command armies and direct the minutest movement of the soldier is very different from the exercise of the power of appointment of a person, by which the higher function of war is performed, through the instrumentality of officers of the Army. The power of appointment in the military service is not incident to the President as an exclusive power of his office, but is subject to the advice and consent of the Senate, so that in its exercise there is called into requisition other volition than the mere will of the President.

Section 2, article 2, of the Constitution provides:

"The President shall, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint the officers designated by the Constitution, and all other officers whose appointments are not herein provided for, but Congress may vest in the President alone the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper."

Congress have not by law vested in the President the appointment of such officers as the claimant, so that it is reserved to the Senate and the President, by the failure of Congress to provide by law an exclusive power in the Executive.

The source of power is not the President alone, but the President and the Senate acting in concert of purpose.

Having determined that the power of appointment in the Army is not incident to the President, except in the discharge of a quasi-civil function, we next inquire what is the source of his jurisdiction over the relations of an officer to the Army and his right to determine the question as to whether an officer is to be kept in the Army, placed on the retired-list, or wholly retired from the service. The last two conditions or relations are the subject of statutory law, they are created by express enactment, are not incident to the officer as a mere soldier, and the President in dealing with such relations is, in the adjustment of rights, wholly dependent upon the letter of positive enactment.

The retiring board upon whose report the President acted is provided for in chapter 2 of The Army, entitled "Retirement," Revised Statutes, 218. Section 1252 of that act provides:

"When the board finds that an officer is incapacitated for active service, and that his incapacity is not the result of an incident of the service, and its decision is approved by the President, the officer shall be retired from active service, or wholly retired from the service, as the President may determine.

"The name of the officer wholly retired from the service shall be omitted from the Army Register."

It will be seen by reference to section 1250 of the foregoing statute that the report of the board is to be laid before the President "for his approval and orders in the case."

Finding 4 clearly indicates that the report of the board was placed before the President for his personal inspection and adjudication. He says, on "review" of the case, the President not being satisfied. The phraseology of the order shows that the President had simply changed his mind upon the sufficiency of the evidence to establish the fact that the disease was not incident to the service.

The order of the 8th of April, 1864, revoking the order of the 6th of October, 1863, retiring claimant from the Army was not to correct a mistake of fact, but to correct an error of judgment the President might have made in approving the recommendation of a board against the weight of evidence.

By finding 2, the board "after mature deliberation and consideration" found the claimant "incapacitated for active service," and recommended that "he be wholly retired from the service, with one year's pay and allowance."

Upon the report of the board the President had the right to adopt one of three courses with the claimant: he could disapprove the finding and thereby retain the claimant in the active service, retire him from active service, or wholly retire him from the Army, as he might determine. He had a power to exercise in the disposition of the report, and his action thereon, made in law, the complete exercise of the full measure of authority provided by the statute. It is not a continuing power, but is performed to the extent of its existence by the one act of the President.

"As a general rule where the law confers a power, and the person on whom it is conferred acts under it, the power is exhausted, unless the same authority authorizes its subsequent exercise." (The People vs. Town of Waynesville, 88 Ill., 470.)

"Whenever a naked power is given to a public officer to do a single particular act in a single defined case, it may be laid down as an axiomatic rule that when the act is once done the power is exhausted." (Runkle's Case, 19 C. Cls. R.).

As was said by the court in Ex parte Randolph (2 Brokenbrough, 473, 474):

"I take it to be a sound principle, that when a special tribunal is created, with limited power and a particular jurisdiction, that whenever the power is once executed the jurisdiction is exhausted and at an end—that the person thus invested with power is, in the language of the law, functus officio.

* * * * * * *

"Examples might be indefinitely multiplied. These are sufficient to illustrate that whenever a special jurisdiction has once executed the power with which it was invested, their power is at an end as to the subject in relation to which it has been executed."

The President having exercised the power given to him by section 1250 of the statute by "wholly retiring" the claimant from the service, his condition, from the legal effect of that act, became that of a private citizen—he was then as though he had never been connected with the Army.

"Officers of the kind are nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate; and if the petitioner ceased to be such an officer when notified that his resignation had been accepted, it requires no argument to show that nothing could reinstate him in the office short of a new nomination and confirmation. Prior to the act of the 13th of July, 1866, the President could dismiss an officer in the military or naval service without the concurrence of the Senate, but he never could nominate and appoint one without the advice and consent of the Senate, as required by the Constitution." (Duharry's Case, 4 Op. Atty.Gen., 603; 14 Stat., 92; Mimmack vs. United States, U.S., 437.)

But it is insisted that the President must of necessity have control of the record, in order to correct mistakes which he might have made in acting without being sufficiently advised, and thereby insure to parties affected a guarantee that injustice will not be done by hasty and inconsiderate action.

Courts or officers, whether acting judicially or in a mere ministerial capacity, so long as they retain jurisdiction of a subject-matter, have complete control, within the purview of their power, to deal with it as their discretion or duty may dictate; but when it passes beyond the line of official authority, either by the duty intrusted having been performed, or by the limitation of time, then the power ceases, and the mode of the execution becomes fixed and irrevocable in law.

It is a principle familiar to all that a court once adjourned ceases to have control of the substance of its decrees and judgments; and while matters of form may be corrected, matters of substance become crystallized into the force of judicial verity.

The finding of the board was placed before the President according to the requirements of the statute; the President approved it by wholly retiring the claimant from the service; not only that, but months afterward he promoted William H. Heilman in place of claimant "retired;" and not only these acts, but on the 31st of December, 1863, he nominated Heilman first lieutenant in place of claimant "retired." These acts following each other are no doubtful confirmation of the recommendation of the board, which in this case went further than the law required in the suggestion that the claimant be "wholly retired."

The retired-list of the Army is regulated by positive law, being that form of just compensation adopted by the policy of the Government toward those whose vigorous life is spent in the service of their country. Its regulation is necessarily very unlike the active branch of the service—one is power, the other is benefaction and gratitude. A code of written law may control one, but not the other.

If the President has the right to change his approval into disapproval, when does the right cease? If it is incident to him because of his high office, and because of the very delicate and important functions inherent in him as the head of the Army, those conditions continuing as they must indefinitely, his right is measured only by the life of the officer.

If the President has the right to revoke an order wholly retiring an officer at any time and under all circumstances, then he must have the correlative right to change an order putting a person on the retired-list to that of "wholly retired."

The right to review his own action, if it exists, must be subject to reasonable limitations.

It can not be the exercise of a power dependent alone on the will of the President. If it does exist and is governed by reasonable rules of limitation, we think to permit a change of the order after approval and two distinct recognitions of such approval would be an unreasonable exercise of the right of review.

As to the power of the President in a case like the one at bar, we cite the following: Mimmack's Case (10 C. Cls. R., 584; 97 U. S., 437); McErath (12 C. Cls. R., 201, affirmed 102 U. S., 426); Blake's Case (14 C. Cls. R., 462, affirmed 103 U. S., 227; 17 C. Cls. R., 344); Miller Case (19 C. Cls. R.); Montgomery Case (19 C. Cls. R.); Bennett Case (19 C. Cls. R.); Palen's Case (19 C. Cls. R.); Runkle Case (19 C. Cls. R.).

The retired-list is of comparatively recent origin, and for years the Army endured through peace and survived in war, efficient in the hands of the President for the maintenance of the national honor and the due enforcement of the law, without the existence of the retired-list, so the regulation of that department of the service can in no wise interfere with the constitutional right and power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the military forces of the United States.

While the President is made Commander-in-Chief by the Constitution, Congress has the right to legislate for the Army, not impairing his efficiency as such Commander-in-Chief, and when a law is passed for the regulation of the Army having that constitutional qualification, he becomes as to that law an executive officer, and is limited in the discharge of his duty by the statute.

The department of the service called "retirement" is the creation of the statute, and he who claims right in it must depend for the measure of his claim on the terms of the law and such reasonable construction as may be justified by the intent and purpose of the Legislature.

If injustice has been done the petititioner, he must seek that forum which is controlled alone by the Constitution. Courts must apply law as they find it.

As to the counterclaim of the defendants, we have said, in the case of Miller, 19th C. Cls.:

"We therefore hold, for the purposes of this case, that he who, through the official act of the President of the United States, occupies an office under the Government, is subjected to all the disqualifications of such office, performs all its duties, and is paid the emoluments thereof, can not be required to return those emoluments to the Government though the President's act may have been in reality unlawful and void and may afterward be so adjudged by a court having jurisdiction of the question."

In accordance with what we believe the law to be, as announced by the Supreme Court in similar cases, and following the precedent of cases decided at the present term, it is the judgment of the court that the claim and counterclaim be dismissed.

From the foregoing it is very clear that by the order of the President of October 6, 1863, wholly retiring McBlair from the service, he became a civilian, and could only again become an officer in the Army by appointment by the President and confirmation by the Senate; and that the order of the President of April 8, 1864, was not an appointment in the Army, and was not made with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Had the President on that day nominated Lieutenant McBlair with the view of retirement, and had sent the nomination to the Senate, the Senate would doubtless have confirmed such nomination, and Lieutenant McBlair would have been placed upon the retired-list with rank and pay from that date, and this is all that in justice or right he is entitled to.

Your committee therefore report this bill back to the Senate and recommend its passage with the amendments therein indicated, made to correspond with the statements of General Drum in the following note:

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 11, 1886.

HON. F. M. COCKRELL, Senate:

Lieut. John Hollins McBlair was last paid to include April 20, 1864, and the order of the Secretary of War to drop his name from the Army retired-list and register is dated November 12, 1884.

R. C. DRUM.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I have no acquaintance with the claimant in this case——

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman permit me to say that I only desired to be understood as yielding to him at the present time for the purpose of having the report read? I would like to make my statement before the gentleman from Illinois addresses the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is immaterial to me whether I go on now or after the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] has spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. It is well that the gentlemen should not misunderstand the posture of the question. The Chair stated that the report could not be read except in the time of some gentleman demanding it. The gentleman from Michigan yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois because the latter desired to demand the reading. The report has been read in the time of the gentleman from Illinois, and he now has the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will reserve the remainder of my time, and let the gentleman from Michigan now take the floor in his own right.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen of the committee will give me their attention for a few moments I will try to abbreviate what has been stated in the report and to give some additional facts. This is a bill for the restoration of Lieut. John Hollins McBlair to the retired-list of the Army. Lieutenant McBlair enlisted in the regular Army of the United States just one month after the firing upon Fort Sumter. He served with his command in different departments, but chiefly in the West, until the autumn of 1863. In September of that year he was ordered before a retiring board created by the act of August 3, 1861, whose duty it was to examine and recommend for retirement officers who had become incapacitated for active service in the field. This retiring board, after an examination, recommended that Lieutenant McBlair be retired from the service absolutely and entirely with one year's pay. Under the statute this retiring board could make one of the three recommendations: First, that the officer be not retired at all; second, that he be placed upon the retired-list with retired pay; and third, that he be retired absolutely, which gave him the privilege of retiring with one year's pay and allowance. In this case the board made the latter recommendation; and the name of Lieutenant McBlair was dropped for the time being from the Army roll.

In the following spring, the spring of 1864, the attention of General Daniel E. Sickles, a friend of Lieutenant McBlair, was called to the circumstances, and believing that a great wrong had been done to Lieutenant McBlair in thus retiring him absolutely from the service, General Sickles went to President Lincoln and called his personal attention to the case. General Sickles, in an affidavit, which was made a part of the report of the Military Committee in the last Congress, states that he went to the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, who said that his attention had never been called to the case, although it had passed through his hands as a matter of routine; that he then went to President Lincoln, who also stated that although it had passed through his hands in the course of routine business of the War Department he knew nothing of the case. Upon the statements made and upon the affidavit presented by General Sickles Mr. Lincoln took his pen and indorsed across the original order of retirement an order revoking the order of retirement and directing that Lieutenant McBlair should be restored to the Army roll to date from the day on which his name had been dropped.

Lieutenant McBlair was then restored to the Army; he was placed upon duty—at first I believe in connection with the Quartermaster-General's Department, afterward at the headquarters of General O. O. Howard as a member of his staff; and he continued in active service until 1870, when he went regularly upon the retired-list and was relieved from further duty. He continued upon the retired-list in this way until 1884. In the spring of that year he made application to the Treasury Department for longevity pay. The Treasury Department referred the claim for longevity pay to the Court of Claims. The court in taking up this claim and examining the case discovered that Lieutenant McBlair had been restored to the Army-roll by an executive order purporting to revoke the order by which originally he had been absolutely retired; and the court, as gentlemen have observed if they have listened to the reading of the report, arrived at the conclusion that when President Lincoln approved of the order of the retiring board retiring Lieutenant McBlair he thereby exhausted his executive power in the premises; and that the only means of revoking that action and restoring Lieutenant McBlair to the Army was by a renomination by the President and confirmation by the Senate. The court therefore, although the question was not before them, decided, or assumed to decide, not only that Lieutenant McBlair was not entitled to longevity pay, but also that he was not entitled to be upon the Army roll at all.

In the report which has been read from the Adjutant-General of the Army, General Drum, it appears that in the spring of 1884 the name of Lieutenant McBlair had not yet been dropped from the Army roll. In 1884, during the last Congress, immediately upon the discovery of this irregularity, this inadvertence as I may say on the part of President Lincoln, this bill was introduced in the Senate. It was reported favorably in that body and passed. It was also considered by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House in the Forty-eighth Congress and favorably—I believe unanimously—reported; but it failed to be reached upon the Calendar of the House, and therefore failed to become a law.

At the beginning of this Congress the bill was again introduced in the Senate and in the House. It has been favorably reported in the Senate and passed by that body, and it is the Senate bill which is now before us. It comes here with the favorable recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. This is a simple and brief statement of the facts of the case.

Lieutenant McBlair, as I have said, enlisted in the regular Army within one month from the beginning of the late war. He served regularly with his command until the fall of 1863, when, on account of disability incurred in the service and in the line of his duty, he was retired. There can be no doubt that if President Lincoln had apprehended his want of power to revoke the executive order by which this officer was retired, and had nominated him to the Senate, the nomination would have been immediately confirmed.

But through an oversight this was not done. General Sickles, in his affidavit (which accompanied the report of the Committee on Military Affairs in the last Congress, but which is not made a part of the report in this Congress), states he had known Lieutenant McBlair for many years. He then says that we (speaking of himself and Senator Ten Eyck, of New Jersey)—"We knew the lieutenant's health was perfectly good until he entered the Army, and we knew when he came back from Kentucky he was broken down. We recommended the circumstances to the President as matters within our knowledge, but what weight he gave to that or what weight he gave to the testimony before the board I do not know."

Mr. Chairman, this is a brief statement of the facts in this case. This man has been on the Army list justly, except for a few months in 1863, from 1864 until April, 1884.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman from Michigan permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman answer why Lieutenant McBlair has not made this application before this late day?

Mr. CUTCHEON. He made it immediately after being dropped. He was on the Army roll until April, 1884.

Mr. OATES. Has he ever applied to Congress before for this relief?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes; immediately—as soon as the matter was brought to his attention. He was only dropped a year ago, and he applied to Congress, then in session. The Senate passed his bill immediately and it came over to the House, where it was favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, but failed to be reached on the Calendar. It is here again in the House and has been favorably reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. So there have been no laches on his part—no neglect.

I reserve the remainder of my time if there should be further use for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifty-one minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I fail to see in the report or the statement on the floor any reason why this claimant should be put on the retired-list of the Army. And I desire to call the attention of the committee to his military record. It is found in the report in this case in the letter sent from the Adjutant-General of the Army:

He was appointed first lieutenant Fifteenth United States Infantry May 14, 1861.

He served with his regiment at Newport Barracks, Ky., from July, 1861, to September, 1861.

Now, if the honorable Speaker were in the chair he could testify to the House that Newport, Ky., was not a dangerous place for a military officer to be stationed during this year—a city just opposite to the city of Cincinnati, which was never in possession of the enemy and never even menaced by them.

So much, then, for his record up to September, 1861. After that he—

Was en route to and in the field in the Department of the Ohio to October, 1861.

Then begins his service up to June, 1862, and it is stated as follows:

On sick-leave and surgeon's certificate of disability to June 13, 1862.

That was from October, 1861, to June 13, 1862, he was on the surgeon's certificate on sick-leave, and not presumed to have been in service. After June, 1862, his record is as follows:

On duty in the office of the Commissary-General of Subsistence to some time in August, 1863, when ordered before retiring board in New York City.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the brilliant military record of this gentleman, principally on sick-leave, and the service actually performed was in the Commissary-General's Department—what the boys called in the Army the "canned-fruit department."

Then after this service on surgeon's certificate and after being in the Commissary-General's Department he was ordered before the retiring board in New York City.

He was wholly retired on account of incapacity for active service in the field, said incapacity not resulting from any incident of service, by paragraph 12, Special Orders No. 447, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, October 6, 1863.

It is said this order was revoked. It was not revoked in the sense of setting it aside, because it was not justly found; but when it was presented to President Lincoln he did not agree in the finding. The finding of the court was in the following words:

After mature deliberation and careful consideration of his case, the board find that First Lieut. J. H. McBlair, jr., Fifteenth United States Infantry, is incapacitated for active service, and that his incapacity does not result from any incident of the service, and the board recommend that he be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay and allowance.

This was a board of his comrades summoned at the time and carefully considering his case.

What did President Lincoln say? He did not say he could agree with the finding of the court as to the fact, but simply wrote on the paper that he be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay and allowance, and that his name he henceforth omitted from the Army Register.

This is all the report furnishes. He was thus placed upon the retired-list and drew his pay from 1863 down to April, 1884—twenty-one years. For twenty-one years he has been on the retired-list receiving pay as lieutenant.

He thought he was entitled to some longevity and took the case to the Court of Claims, but the Court of Claims decided the order of the President placing him on the retired-list was without warrant of law. He could approve or disapprove of the sentence, but could not nominate him as an officer and place him on the retired-list.

Therefore he had been, according to the decision of the Court of Claims, illegally drawing pay for twenty-one years on the retired-list; and now the object of this bill is to validate the payments made to him during all these years and authorize the President to place him on the retired-list in the regular way and at the same rank.

These, Mr. Chairman, seem to be the facts as obtained from the official records and as are embodied in this report which is presented to us from the Committee on Military Affairs. In addition I have received a letter from a physician of this city, which any member can examine if he feels sufficient interest in the case to look at it, stating that this officer never performed any military duty in the field whatever, and it seems from the report accompanying the case that this is true. The letter goes on to say further that he is now a practicing physician in this city and able to earn his own living. I state again, Mr. Chairman, therefore, that I fail to see anything, either in the papers presented in this case or in the statement made by the honorable gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], to show that the military record of this gentleman entitles him, in the first place, to be put upon the Army Register as a retired officer, by which means he has drawn twenty-one years of pay as of that rank; and, further, I fail to see any reason why he should now be put upon that list on account of his military services. If this gentleman can be put upon the retired-list I know of no officer who ought not—if now disabled in any way, or who has any claim to recognition in the late war—who ought not and should not also be placed upon that list and with equal propriety. If this gentleman had performed some distinguished military service; if he had endured some great hardship, or if it appeared from the record that he had incurred his disability in the service of his country, I should not object. He would, in that event, have been entitled to receive a pension from the Government, and his name would have been on the pension-roll.

But it does not appear that he ever applied for a pension, or that he ever went to the office to test the question as to whether the disability under which he claims to suffer was incurred in the service or not. Having failed to go to the Pension Office to apply for a pension we may reasonably assume that he himself recognizes the fact that his disability was not incurred in the service, and hence was not of such a character as to entitle him to a pension.

That is all I desire to say at present in reference to this case.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois would lead us to infer that there was some question here at issue in regard to the matter of back pay which had been drawn by this officer during the twenty years he was on the retired-list. If the gentleman from Illinois had listened carefully to the report—and I know that he did listen to a part of it, but was absent from his seat when this particular portion was read—he would have discovered that this question has already been passed upon by the Court of Claims. He will find it quoted in the report, a little below the middle of the fifth page, in the following words:

As to the counterclaim of the defendants, we have said, in case of Miller, 19 C. Cls. R.:

"We therefore hold, for the purposes of this case, that he who, through the official act of the President of the United States, occupies an office under the Government, is subjected to all the disqualifications of such office, performs all its duties, and is paid the emoluments thereof, can not be required to return those emoluments to the Government, though the President's act may have been in reality unlawful and void and may afterward be so adjudged by a court having jurisdiction of the question."

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I have no objection to grant a full release and receipt for all the moneys heretofore received up to this time. I only object to future payments on this account.

Mr. CUTCHEON. A court of competent jurisdiction has already decided that part of the question and it is not now before us.

Now, this claim for restoration rests upon a few simple facts. First, that this young man when he entered the service, robust in health,

"sound," as General Sickles says, gave himself to the service of his country at a time when he was abundantly able to take care of himself. General Sickles says further that he knows when he returned from Kentucky he was broken down; and President Lincoln found that to be true, and placed him upon the retired-list, because he had lost his health and his means of self-support while in the service of the Government.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, comes before us not as if it was here for the first time, but it is here merely, in fact, to correct an error or an oversight. The gentleman from Illinois seems to convey the idea that unless an officer has been on the front line of battle, unless he has been out upon the skirmish line somewhere where the bullets were flying and gunpowder could be smelt, he had rendered little or no service to the country. I need not here in this presence tell the gentleman that officers are just as necessary in posts like that of Newport (Ky.) Barracks as upon the battle line; and perhaps Kentucky, in these years 1861 and 1862, was not altogether such a salubrious climate as the gentleman from Illinois would have us to infer, and upon that subject I desire to yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, General WOLFORD, who is familiar with the facts of the case.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, this bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs after a very careful and thorough investigation by that committee; and I have no doubt if gentlemen would take pains to understand it that even the gentleman from Illinois himself would approve of it cheerfully. But the gentleman from Illinois falls into a very great mistake. He says that this officer was stationed at Newport Barracks, in Kentucky, and therefore in no great danger. Why, sir, the gentleman is entirely ignorant of the history of Kentucky at that period.

In 1861, when troops were called for to defend the Union and the flag of the nation, the governor of Kentucky issued a proclamation that no troops be raised in Kentucky, and to back the governor of Kentucky, a very strong and powerful and wealthy party presented themselves to prevent Union troops from being raised. I remember, sir, very well when I became a soldier in the Union Army that we could not be mustered in by State authority, but had to ask the President of the United States to send a mustering officer and muster us in. I remember, too, when the soil of Kentucky was so dangerous to Union men at the time this officer was sent to Newport Barracks that it was thought necessary to provide every defense that could be had. If ever there were troops needed in this world they were needed in Kentucky at that time to form a power around which men could rally for the Union. If ever there was a time when troops were needed it was after the governor of Kentucky issued that proclamation. The governor, Beriah Magoffin, a very clever man, came to me and said I had better go home. I said he had better resign, that that was the best thing he could do for his country at that time. He did not resign and I did not go home. There was war in Kentucky from the very day we entered the camp at Camp Dick Robinson. There was war in Kentucky from the very day that this officer went to Newport Barracks until he went away; and not only that, but invading armies came through Kentucky, and Kentucky's own sons, gallant men and true—I see some of them here now and they can bear witness to what I say—unfurled the flag of the confederacy and fought us at our doors. There was no place in Kentucky that could not be called a battle-ground.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who is not conversant with the history of Kentucky, can not tell my confederate friends from Kentucky that there was no war then in that State. These gentlemen representing Kentucky proudly and nobly on this floor know there was a mighty and powerful effort to carry Kentucky out of the Union, and that effort well-nigh succeeded. We had a terrible time to prevent its success. And now is the gentleman from Illinois to read the history of Kentucky again and tell us there was no danger? My friend from Kentucky yonder would not believe it. My friend from Kentucky sitting over there would not believe it. No man that was in the Union Army or in the confederate army will believe the gentleman from Illinois when he says there was no danger in Kentucky in 1861 and 1862. Sir, Kentucky was a battlefield. Almost every mile of ground in Kentucky was drenched in blood by one side or the other. Those on the other side believed they were right and we believed we were right; and while they were firing the Southern heart to energy we were firing the Union heart to energy and to bring the war to a close.

I tell the gentleman from Illinois he is mistaken when he thinks there was no use for troops in Kentucky. We had use for them everywhere in Kentucky. It was a disputed territory everywhere, and we needed them there, if anywhere in this Union.

But the gentleman from Illinois says this officer has got his pay until last year, and he does not object to that. The gentleman can not help himself there. The court has decided it belongs to him. By a mistake he was mustered out of the service; and let me state for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who is as much mistaken about this whole case as he is about the situation of affairs in Kentucky in 1861 and 1862, that this man was a soldier in the regular Army, not a volunteer. He relies for his pension, as all regular officers and soldiers do, by being upon the retired-list; that is the way he gets it, and it is to put him right before the country, to put him back to that office which he was denied by a retiring board, that this bill is reported.

I do not say that that board did not do their duty, but the President thought they were mistaken. President Lincoln thought so, and issued his order, and believed he had a right to do it. The country submitted to it, and everybody believed it was right until this officer put in his claim for more pay under the law. I believe soldiers as well as everybody else are inclined to get all the law will allow them; and that is all you can charge them with. He wanted to get all the law allowed. He appealed to the court with that object in view, and then it was discovered that the power by which he held his office was doubtful because the President had not nominated him to the Senate. Now he wants an enabling act to place him back where he was, supposing President Lincoln had done right and that his friends who recommended him had done right. He wants, just like every other honest man who has any pride of character—and no one will say that a soldier has no pride of character—he wants to be reinstated where he was. Who can object to that?

I have nothing more to say about this case. I only rose for the purpose of dispelling that idea which my friend from Illinois had about the peaceful times in Kentucky in 1861 and 1862.

Mr. BRAGG. I hope, sir, the committee will favorably consider and pass this bill. I am not here to go into the details of this officer's service. I know that he entered the service a young, healthy man. I know that he came out of the service broken down physically and has continued so from thence till now. I know that the retiring board directed that he be retired wholly from the service upon the theory that the cause of his retirement existed prior to his enlistment.. And I know that the action of that board was approved, nominally by the President but really by the assistant Secretary of War, Colonel Hardee, without the President's examination or knowledge of the case. I know that there was presented to Mr. Lincoln evidence showing the health of the young man at the time he entered the service, showing the error in the order, and I know that Mr. Lincoln directed that order to be revoked, and such is the finding of the Court of Claims. Under that revocation he directed this man to be placed upon the retired-list, and he entered upon that list and there remained until about 1884, when this question was raised as to the authority of Mr. Lincoln. The only question presented by this bill is whether an officer whose health was broken down in the service of the United States, who has been on the retired-list, and who was placed on that list by the President of the United States, shall now, after this length of time, under a technicality, have a coroner's inquest held upon him, and, after he has passed middle life, be turned out in a dependent condition by reason of incapacity that resulted from his efforts to serve his country in the great struggle for the life of the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir; I will permit you to cross-examine me as much as you choose; but I will say first, before we commence the cross-examination, that when you speak of this gentleman being examined by a board of his "comrades" you little know what a retiring board of the Army is.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not mean that they were soldiers who had served in the field with him, but they were certainly persons not prejudiced against him, and that is what I meant by the remark.

Mr. BRAGG. Very likely they were not prejudiced against him, but, as the evidence shows, they were misinformed as to the manner in which his incapacity arose.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] this question: If this officer was retired by reason of wounds or disease contracted in the service, was he not entitled to a pension, and could he not have got a pension if he had applied for it in the regular way?

Mr. BRAGG. Every officer of the Army of the United States is entitled to a pension for wounds received or disease contracted in the military service of the United States, but the retired-list of the Army is a list or roll of honor—so it was intended to be—upon which shall be placed the names of officers who have become disabled in the service and who had abandoned the pursuits of civil life to become professional soldiers, upon the theory that one who has done that and endeavored to fit himself to be a professional soldier has failed to learn those habits of business, those keen, sharp, shrewd tricks which are necessary for success as the world goes now. For that reason this list was provided for such officers in lieu of pensions.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman please state whether or not, if this bill should pass, it would establish a precedent by which every officer of the Army who has contracted disease in the service would be entitled to be placed upon the retired-list as of the rank held by him in the Army?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. Why not?

Mr. BRAGG. No more so than those who are now on the retired-list furnish such a precedent. Every man who is on the roll by reason of disease contracted in the service is entitled to be there. This man was entitled to be there. Mr. Lincoln so determined and so ordered upon a review of the evidence, and he was the court of last resort. The question now made is upon a technicality; the court holding under strict legal construction that, although the Secretary of War approved the finding of the board in the name of the President, it became functus officio, and a subsequent act of the President himself was null and void, although it was recognized and ratified by the Government year after year until this officer had passed away beyond middle age.

Mr. SPRINGER. One word more, Mr. Chairman. If this officer desires to be recognized like other officers of the Union Army as having been disabled by disease contracted in the service the law has provided a pension for such cases, and I will vote to put him on the pension-roll with a pension according to the rank to which he belonged. That will be placing him upon an equality with other officers of the late war.

Mr. BRAGG. There is where you are mistaken again.

Mr. SPRINGER. Why so?

Mr. BRAGG. Because officers of the regular Army who are incapacitated by disease do not draw pensions or go upon the retired-list. This man was an officer of the regular Army, and his pension-roll is the retired-list.

Mr. SPRINGER. How many years does an officer have to serve, and what must be his age, before he can be placed upon that honorable roll?

Mr. BRAGG. If a man goes into the service to-day and becomes disabled to-morrow he is as much entitled to go upon the retired-list of the Army as if he had served twenty years before becoming disabled; because the disability determines the question of retirement. No; I am stating that too broadly. There are certain classes of cases where officers have a right to be retired upon their own application after so many years of faithful service—forty years for one class and thirty for the other; but as to those who are retired for disability no particular length of service is required. All that is required is the contraction of the disability in the service.

Mr. SPRINGER. You are speaking of the regular Army now?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes; and this was a regular Army officer, not a volunteer.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire that the Committee of the Whole should understand the basis upon which this claim is made. It appears in the official report of the Department that the service of this officer was as follows:

He served with his regiment at Newport Barracks, Ky., from July, 1861, to September, 1861; was en route to and in the field in the Department of the Ohio to October, 1861, and sick with regiment to November 18, 1861; on sick-leave and surgeon's certificate of disability to June 13, 1862; on duty in the office of the Commissary-General of Subsistence to some time in August, 1863, when ordered before retiring board in New York city.

That is the whole record of this officer's service. Now, the retiring board, having examined his case, made the following finding:

After mature deliberation and careful consideration of this case the court find that First Lieut. J. H. McBlair, jr., Fifteenth United States Infantry, is incapacitated for active service, and that his incapacity does not result from any incident of the service; and the board recommend that he be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay and allowance.

That is all there is official in this case. The rest was extra-official and outside of regular Army regulations, as the Court of Claims held.

A MEMBER. Was the officer ever at the front?

Mr. SPRINGER. Never nearer than Newport, Ky., just across the river from the city of Cincinnati. The Court of Claims held that this appointment on the retired-list was illegal. Therefore he has been on the retired-list for twenty-one years by reason of an illegal appointment; and this bill seeks to legalize that appointment. He went to the Court of Claims on another question—the question of longevity pay.

Mr. BRAGG. And the decision of the Court of Claims is mere obiter dictum; it related to a question not before the court.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the Court of Claims so held. The ruling may have been obiter dictum; but nobody will say that it is not the truth; nobody will say that the court did not state the law correctly.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not think they did.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] differs from the Court of Claims. I want that noted in the RECORD; and I rather think that on ordinary occasions I would take the opinion of the gentleman from Wisconsin in preference to the finding of that distinguished judicial tribunal.

Now upon this record I think this man is not entitled to be placed on the retired-list for the rest of his life. But if his friends think he incurred his disability in the service, I am willing to vote him by special act a pension as of his rank—not that he be placed on the retired-list with that honorable body of officers who have, as we presume and as I believe, won their distinction by some meritorious service in the field.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] seems to have an idea that a soldier in the service selects his post of duty. It seems to be the burden of his complaint in this case that this lieutenant was serving at Newport, Ky., instead of at some place at the front. Now, my experience as a soldier, and I think the experience of every gentleman who served in the Army, is that a soldier goes ordinarily where he is ordered to go, and he stays where he is ordered to stay. I do not know that it is anything to the discredit of Lieutenant McBlair that he was ordered to Newport, Ky., instead of some other point, or that he remained there in obedience to his orders. Nor have I ever yet learned that it is the fault of a soldier or an officer that he was sick in the service or was absent upon a surgeon's certificate of disability. It is his misfortune, but it is never his fault, so far as my experience goes. So all this talk about this officer not having had severe duty, about his not having been at "the front," goes absolutely for naught. The officer goes where his commanding officer directs him to go.

That Lieutenant McBlair was disabled there is no question; for this retiring board ordered that he be retired absolutely from the service because he was disabled. The only question is whether that disability arose after he entered the service or not.

Now, General Daniel E. Sickles, in an affidavit which was made a part of the report in the Forty-eighth Congress, states that he knew Lieutenant McBlair prior to his enlistment and knew him to be a sound young man.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy further time of the committee by dwelling upon the facts in this case. This measure has been twice reported favorably by the Military Committee of the House, twice reported favorably by the Military Committee of the Senate, and twice passed by that body. I now move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 72, nays 27; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. CUTCHEON and Mr. SPRINGER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 127, noes 41.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

WILLIAM P. CHAMBLISS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 68) for the relief of William P. Chambliss.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to reinstate William B. Chambliss, late a major of the Fourth Regiment United States Cavalry, and place his name on the list of retired officers of the United States Army with the rank of major: Provided, however, That he shall receive no pay, compensation, or allowance of any kind under the provisions of this act for the time intervening between the 1st day of November, 1867, the date of his resignation, and the date of the approval of this act: Provided further, That the retirement herein provided for shall be in addition to the number now authorized by law.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I suppose nobody will oppose this just and righteous bill for the relief of one of the most gallant soldiers that ever was in our Army——

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that no gentleman has a right to have the report read except when he is on the floor. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor to advocate the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the Chair rule that the report can not be read except in the time of some one taking the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the rule, as the Chair understands it. The Clerk will read from page 433 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

It has been held, and that ruling on appeal sustained, that the reading of the report accompanying the pending proposition can not be demanded as a matter of right except in the time of the member making such demand. It has been repeatedly held that the reading of a report is in the nature of debate, and of course such report must be governed by the rules regulating debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] will proceed.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I supposed that most of the members here had read this report, and that where the justice and righteousness of the case are so apparent to every man who will read the report, there would be no objection to the passage of the bill. The question is simply as to the reinstatement upon the retired-list of one of the most gallant soldiers who was ever in the Union Army. Entering the military service of the United States when but a boy, he distinguished himself in the war with Mexico. After that, as his convictions led him, he became an officer in the regular Army. Believing the cause of the Union was the right one, he went with his regiment to the front. I will not undertake to enumerate the number of battles he was in and in which he distinguished himself. Suffice it to say, at Gaines's Mill, close to the Chickahominy, he was shot almost to pieces and rendered a cripple for the balance of his life.

When the battle was over he was taken prisoner, for they got the better of us at that place, as will be remembered by those present conversant with the history of the civil war. While incarcerated in prison he suffered very severely from his wounds. The gallant men who fought on both sides who were there and saw him while a prisoner believed it was a miracle he ever recovered.

After the war was over, being wholly disabled, and judging it to be the best for his country, he left the Army. Just after his resignation the law was passed for a retired-list. He comes back here now, not asking for pay for the time he has been out of the Army, but simply to be reinstated in the rank he then held and placed upon the retired-list. This is all there is of the case.

No human being can find fault with his character, morally or intellectually, and no human being can find fault with his conduct as a soldier. Wherever danger was he went cheerfully, and he was always found in the thickest of the fight. At the terrible battle of Gaines's Mill he was so badly wounded as to be crippled and disabled forever.

I care not what prejudice any one may have on the facts which have been here presented. I believe it is only simple justice to grant this man what he asks. He is a man against whom slander has never uttered a word. He has a character for honor and gallantry above reproach; pure, noble, patriotic, and brave, with every characteristic to commend him to the highest consideration of Congress and the country. He asks simply that he shall be restored to his rank and placed upon the retired-list. Let us give him that recognition. You have recognized men for their gallantry and for the wounds they received in battle. Why, then, shall this man, with his splendid record, be refused that position on the retired-list to which, under the precedents which have been established, he is clearly entitled?

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not as cognizant with all the facts in the case as my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], and I will yield to him whatever of my time he wants.

Mr. STEELE. I will reserve my time to see if there is any necessity of speaking further in favor of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I will take the floor, not for the purpose of making any remarks on this bill, but to have the report of the committee read in my time, under the ruling of the Chair. I see no reason, from the remarks made, why a man who leaves the Army for nineteen years, by resignation, and deprives the country of the flower of his life, shall be permitted to come back in his old age and be restored again to the Army and placed upon the retired-list. I am informed this man is now drawing a pension.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me make a statement before the report is read in the gentleman's time?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have read the report in this case, and contrasted it with the action of the House in the other case, and it seems to me like a waste of time to have any papers read on the subject. If the gentleman whom we have just placed upon the retired-list is entitled to be placed there as a lieutenant, then this man should be placed on the retired-list as a major-general. [Laughter.] This man has a record; this man went into the war and was severely wounded. As General McClellan states, his body was literally riddled with bullets. He served his country faithfully and to the extent of his ability. He fought when a boy in the Mexican war and for three years in the late war. He was left on the field of battle for dead. He has not been on the retired-list since his resignation, drawing pay, as was the case with the other officers. He only received the pension he was entitled to for his wounds and disability under the law. Therefore I say now, to keep this man off the retired-list after placing the other man upon it would be to be guilty of palpable injustice. I hope, therefore, this man will be allowed, in recognition of his distinguished services and of the severe wounds he received in battle, to be placed on the retired-list, as we have already set the example by putting upon the retired-list a man who was not only never wounded, but never served in the field. After placing such a man on the retired-list, who never did anything for his country, we surely can not refuse to put on the retired-list a man whose body was riddled with bullets and who was left on the field of battle for dead.

Mr. McMILLIN. In answer to what the gentleman from Illinois has said, I will simply state that my object is not to legislate by comparison or to put this man on because another was put on, but to have the report read in order to see whether there are intrinsic grounds why he should go on the retired-list. I have no objection, if he was disabled in the line of duty, to give him that pension others in a similar situation have been granted and to which he is entitled under the law. If there be peculiar circumstances entitling him to more, then I will be willing to give him whatever further amount he deserves. But, sir, I know no reason why we should encourage resignations from the Army after a man has staid out of the service for twenty years to allow him to return and be restored to the rank and pay he formerly held, and especially where the man has been drawing the full pension allowed by the law for the disability which he has suffered.

Mr. STEELE. Let me call the gentleman's attention to one fact. This officer, as the record discloses, was physically unable to perform active duty. He was ordered to Texas, and in consequence of not being able to go there, notwithstanding the fact that he was eligible to retirement, he says: "I have plenty to live on, and can get along without asking the Government in her distress to put me on the retired-list; so I will resign."

Now he finds after all these years—his family growing up around him—that he does not have enough of the world's goods for their support. He is very poor, and, having been shot to pieces, finds that the scanty pay he gets is not sufficient to maintain him and his family, and he is not able in consequence of his wounds to support himself. He therefore asks to be placed where he was eligible to be placed on the day of his resignation.

Mr. COX. What is his age?

Mr. STEELE. He is about sixty years old. He was a very gallant man; performed distinguished service, and, as I say, only asks to be placed where he was eligible to be placed the day he resigned. He does not ask a single cent for the intermediate time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if this case is not something like that of Fitz-John Porter?

Mr. STEELE. This case has a great deal of merit, while the other has none. That is the difference.

Mr. McMILLIN. I mean as to placing him upon the retired-list.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Because I noticed that the gentleman was making some very vigorous remarks yesterday on that case, but he happened to be on the other side.

Mr. WOLFORD. Well, he was wrong then, but he is right now.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is better to be right once than never. I do not think that this marked and much to be regretted tendency to increase the retired-list ought to be indulged in. There is a constantly growing disposition, a sort of retiring itch, that takes possession of men with reference to such questions, until we can hardly claim that this is not a country of laborers on the one hand to pay bounties to men upon the other hand who do not labor or perform any service. This bill will entitle its beneficiary not only to the retired-pay of a major, the rank fixed in the bill, but he will also be receiving a pension. He gets the pension he is entitled to under the law, and will get in addition to that his retired-pay of major in the Army, the rank fixed in the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. McMILLIN. If I am mistaken will the gentleman point out the provision in the law which will prevent it?

Mr. BRAGG. It does not need any provision in the law to prevent it.

Mr. McMILLIN. But I understood the gentleman to say that I was mistaken.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir, I said you were mistaken with reference to drawing pension while on the retired-list.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why?

Mr. BRAGG. Because when he goes on the retired-list the pension ceases.

Mr. McMILLIN. Very well; if that is the law, so far so good. I think there ought not to be any doubt of it.

Mr. BRAGG. If there is any question insert an amendment to the bill providing that this shall be in lieu of all pay and allowances.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is not necessary to do so if the gentleman's position is correct.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. WOLFORD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 68) for the relief of William P. Chambliss, late major in the Fourth United States Cavalry, brevet lieutenant-colonel, United States Army, have duly considered the same, and recommend its passage. They find that the bill has previously been before Congress, and has never been unfavorably acted on by any committee of either House. They also find that a similar bill was reported favorably by the Military Committee of the Forty-seventh Congress, and that the bill passed the House.

The facts upon which this recommendation is based are so fully set forth in the accompanying papers that your committee ask to make them a part of their report.

Military history of William P. Chambliss, late of the United States Army, as shown by the files of this office.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, D. C., May 13, 1880.

Enrolled as second lieutenant Company E, First Tennessee Mounted Volunteers, May 23, 1846, and served with regiment in Texas and in the war with Mexico until the muster-out of regiment in June, 1847. Re-entered service as captain Company C, Third Tennessee Volunteers, October 7, 1847, and served in the war with Mexico until mustered out with company July 24, 1848. Appointed first lieutenant Second United States Cavalry March 3, 1855; promoted captain April 6, 1861 (Fifth Cavalry, August 3, 1861), and major Fourth Cavalry March 30, 1864. On regimental recruiting service in Tennessee from May 8 to September 14, 1855; with regiment at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., to October 27, 1855; en route to aid in Texas to May 18, 1858; on recruiting service to April 19, 1859; on leave of absence (not sick leave) to September 22, 1859; on duty at Carlisle Barracks, Pa., to March 8, 1860; on recruiting service to July, 1860; on delay to October 17, 1860; on duty at Carlisle Barracks, Pa., to November, 1860; conducting recruits to and with regiment in Texas to April, 1861; at Washington, D. C., to March 10, 1862, and in the field, Army of the Potomac, to June 27, 1862, when wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Gaines's Mill, Virginia; prisoner of war to July, 1862; absent on account of wounds and on parole to October 23, 1862; assistant instructor of tactics and commanding cavalry detachment at the Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., to August 23, 1864; special inspector of cavalry, Military Division of the Mississippi, from September, 1864, to December 23, 1865; joined and in command of regiment at San Antonio, Tex., from February 20 to May 9, 1866, and on duty with regiment at same place to October 19, 1866, and on leave of absence (not sick leave) to date of resignation, November 1, 1867.

His resignation was tendered on account of the condition of his wife's health.

Copy of surgeon's certificate given by Surgeon J. F. Hammond, United States Army, dated August 20, 1862, describing nature of wounds received June 27, 1862, by Captain Chambliss herewith.

SAMUEL BRECK,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Capt. W. P. Chambliss, of the Fifth Regiment of United States Cavalry, having applied for a certificate on which to ground an application for leave of absence, I do hereby certify that I have carefully examined this officer, and find that he is suffering from gunshot wounds and from dislocation of right shoulder. The latter is reduced. One wound is from a musket-ball in the left shoulder; one from buckshot in upper part of right side of chest in front; one from a rifle-ball through the abdomen and one through the left thigh. The wounds of the shoulder and abdomen are still open and discharging. They confine him to bed. They were all received in battle at Gaines's Mill, near the Chickahominy, Virginia, the 27th June, 1862, and that in consequence thereof he is, in my opinion, unfit for duty. I further declare my belief that he will not be able to resume his duties in a less period than sixty days.

J. F. HAMMOND,
Surgeon, United States Army.

Dated at New York city this 20th day of August, 1862.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Trenton, March 22, 1880.

Independently of his services, when a mere boy, in the Mexican war, the admirable, gallant, and soldierly manner in which Col. William P. Chambliss performed his duty during the recent war merits high appreciation and reward.

Literally riddled with balls, he was left for days on the field of battle at Gaines's Mill, only to be taken thence to the Libby prison.

Escaping death as by a miracle, he has for several years past been in wretched health—the consequence of his many wounds, of exposure on the field of battle, and of a still unextracted ball.

If under any circumstances an officer who has voluntarily resigned his commission can be placed on the retired-list, I think that Colonel Chambliss, by his services and sufferings, eminently deserves to be of the number.

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

I certify the foregoing is a correct copy of the original, which is now before me.

ROGER JONES,
Lieut. Col., Asst. Insp. Gen'l U. S. A.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 20, 1880.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
Mercer County, ss:

On the 21st day of April, before me, a notary public in and for said State, personally appeared George B. McClellan, who, being by me duly sworn, declares and says that he is personally acquainted with William P. Chambliss, late captain Fifth United States Cavalry, and that the said Capt. William P. Chambliss was present with his company and regiment at the battle of Gaines's Mill, Virginia, on the 27th day of June, 1862, the army then being under my command, and that he was left on the field suffering from a wound from a musket-ball in the left shoulder, and from a buckshot wound in the upper part of the chest, and from a rifle-ball through the abdomen and another through the left thigh.

He had also received other injuries, among them the dislocation of the right shoulder.

He remained some days on the field of battle, and was finally taken into Richmond as a prisoner, but was exchanged a few weeks afterward. His condition when exchanged was such that his recovery seemed impossible, and I think that very few survived such wounds and exposure as fell to the lot of Captain Chambliss.

He further declares that he has no interest directly or indirectly in this matter.

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 21st day of April, 1880; and I certify that I have no interest, either directly or indirectly, in this matter.

[SEAL.] JAMES S. KIGER, Notary Public.

(Certificate of official character on file.)

FORT WAYNE, MICH., July 19, 1880.

SIR: At the battle of Gaines's Mill, Virginia, June 27, 1862, I was twice wounded, made prisoner, and carried into Richmond and placed in the sick ward of the Libby prison. Four days afterward Capt. William P. Chambliss, Fourth Cavalry, was brought into the same ward and laid alongside me for nearly three weeks. He was wounded with one bullet and six buckshot, and had lain out on the battlefield four days and four nights. He was placed on a cot, on which had died the day before a Union officer sick with erysipelas, and Captain Chambliss was soon attacked with the same disease in all of his wounds.

I saw his wounds dressed and his body painted with iodine almost every day. The bullet wound was in the belly, ranging from left to right. He must have had his left side toward the enemy when shot; for the buckshot entered his left shoulder, his left breast, neck, and one of them, if my memory serves me rightly, entered beneath the left shoulder-blade and just above the region of the kidneys and about three or four inches from the spinal column, and lodged, where I do not know.

I knew Captain Chambliss well. I had seen him with his regiment in the Army of the Potomac but a short time before the battle of Gaines's Mill. He was laid on a cot alongside of me, and I heard from his own lips a description of the charge in which his horse was shot, and he was wounded as narrated above at the same time.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. B. CLITZ,
Colonel Tenth Infantry.

To the honorable COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C.

CINCINNATI, June 25, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to state that I was wounded at the battle of Gaines's Mill on June 27, 1862, and taken to Libby prison as prisoner of war. In this prison, and lying next to and very near to me was William P. Chambliss, then a captain of the Fifth United States Cavalry. He was very dangerously wounded, and for several weeks it was thought impossible that he could live. Being so near to him I became perfectly familiar with his condition; daily saw his wounds dressed, and perfectly well knew the nature and extent of them, and expected that each day would see his suffering relieved by death. He was wounded in the abdomen by a gunshot, and in the left thigh gunshot, charge of buckshot, and right shoulder dislocated from fall from his horse; also a gunshot wound in the back close to one of his kidneys, the ball remaining in his body; it could not be extracted, and no doubt entirely disables him. Captain Chambliss, Major Citz, Twelfth United States Infantry, and myself were paroled and taken to Westover Landing the same day, and came to New York in the hospital ship towed by the Vanderbilt. Captain Chambliss was even then so critical in condition that he had to at once enter hospital in New York city.

From my personal knowledge of his condition resulting from wounds received in battle, I do not consider him capable to perform any duty of a character requiring a reasonable amount of physical exertion; and that he is still alive is a remarkable case and exceptional in every way.

I certify the above to be a true statement of the facts in this case so far as my recollection serves me at this time.

P. W. STANHOPE,
Major, U. S. A.

To the honorable COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C.

COBURG, CANADA, March 15, 1880.

Colonel Chambliss has been attended by me professionally for seven years. I first attended him for a severe attack of pain, which resembled nephritic colic. It was, as I supposed, caused by an unextracted musket or rifle ball lying in the vicinity of the left kidney. Since then his health has been tolerable for some days and other days miserable. I consider his present state of health arises from the severe wound he received in battle, from exposure on the field for ten days afterward, and also from subsequent confinement in Libby Prison.

GEORGE WATERS, M. D.

I certify that the foregoing papers are true copies of the originals on file in claim for pension certificate No. 172002 of William P. Chambliss, late captain Company D, Fifth United States Cavalry.

O. P. G. CLARKE,
Acting Commissioner of Pensions.

JANUARY 18, 1882.

Examining surgeon's certificate in the case of an original applicant.

[No. of application, 347140.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22, 1880.

We hereby certify that we have carefully examined William P. Chambliss, late a captain Company D, Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, in the service of the United States, who is an applicant for an invalid pension by reason of alleged disability resulting from gunshot wounds of abdomen and back and injury of right shoulder.

In our opinion the said Chambliss is totally incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence from manual labor from the cause above stated.

Judging from his present condition, and from the evidence before —, it is — belief that the said disability did —— originate in the service aforesaid in the line of duty.

The disability is ———.

A more particular description of the applicant's condition is subjoined:

Height, 5 feet 11 inches; weight, 142 pounds; complexion, light; age, fifty-three years; pulse 84°; respiration, 18°. Gunshot wound, ball entered just in front of anterior inferior spinous process of left ilium, and passing to the right came out at a corresponding point on right side; cicatrices large and adherent, with loss of substance (one-half). Gunshot wound, ball entered an inch to the left of spinal process of ninth dorsal vertebra, and, he says, lodged and still remains; cicatrix depressed and adherent; loss of substance; tenderness on pressure in region of left kidney; complains of much pain in that region with dysuria most of the time, movements of the body painful, and particularly stooping (one-half); some thickening of tissues about the right shoulder joint and its motion impaired; atrophy (slight) of muscles of right arm, one-fourth of an inch less than the other; loss of power in arm and hand (one-fourth).

ROBERT REYBURN, M. D.,
President Board of Examining Surgeons.
J. O. STANTON, M. D.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, William P. Chambliss, a citizen of Tennessee, late a major in the Fourth United States Cavalry, and brevet lieutenant-colonel, United States Army, respectfully asks Congress to pass an act authorizing the President of the United States to reinstate and place his name upon the retired-list of the Army, with the rank of major, to date from the passage of the act.

In support of this petition he has the honor to submit the following statement of facts:

He first entered the service of his country, when a mere youth, as an officer in the Tennessee volunteers, and served throughout the war with Mexico. He re-entered the Army as a lieutenant of cavalry in 1855, and served continuously until he resigned in 1867, sharing the dangers of the Peninsular campaign, during which, at the battle of Gaines's Mill, he was dangerously wounded, literally riddled with balls, and left on the field of battle for ten days; whence he was removed to Richmond and confined in the Libby Prison until paroled, and subsequently underwent treatment for several months at Saint Luke's Hospital, New York; in the language of General McClellan, "escaping death as if by a miracle."

At the time of his resignation of his commission as an officer of the Army, his services, wounds, and sufferings gave him, under the law, the right to be placed upon the retired-list with the rank he then held. By his voluntary resignation he waived this right, not then supposing his constitution was so undermined by the effect of his wounds, sufferings, and exposure as to eventually destroy his health; and he now prays the passage of an act removing the disability to his retirement caused by his resignation, with no compensation for the time he was out of the service.

In support of the foregoing prayer attention is respectfully invited to the following papers, which are made a part of this petition.

In conclusion he submits, with confidence in the wisdom and justice of Congress, the question of his reinstatement and retirement, satisfied if its judgment should be adverse, profoundly grateful if favorable.

WILLIAM P. CHAMBLISS,
Late Major Fourth U. S. Cavalry, and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel, U. S. Army.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 21, 1880.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to add an amendment to the bill, providing that this shall be in lieu of all pension, so that there will be no doubt upon the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee propose an amendment now?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will submit the amendment and have it pending until other gentlemen who desire may be heard upon the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned there is but one question in my mind. There seems to be no question whatever as to the merits of the case; but I wish to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether this officer had the right under the law as it existed at the time of his resignation to go on the retired-list.

Mr. STEELE. He had the right. He was eligible for retirement at that time.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If he had the right, then I will vote to restore it to him now.

Mr. STEELE. He was in the regular Army and was disabled, as the report shows, and was then eligible for retirement.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The whole question seems to turn on that point, as to the right or policy governing future cases of this character.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the bill the words "and in lieu of all pensions."

Mr. McMILLIN. I submit that, in order that he may not draw both the pay of a major on the retired-list and the pension at the same time.

Mr. BRADY. He could not do that anyhow.

Mr. STEELE. He would be prohibited from that under the law anyway.

Mr. McMILLIN. But there seems to be some doubt upon that point.

Mr. HOUK. Is not that the law already?

Mr. McMILLIN. It is claimed by some it is and by some it is not. I am not familiar with the law myself, but I offer this amendment to make assurance double sure.

Mr. HOUK. Have we got to enact amendments to cover all the law my colleague does not know?

Mr. McMILLIN. If we pass statutes to cover all the gentleman from Tennessee does not know the statute-books would be four times as large as they are now.

Mr. HOUK. It will not do my colleague any good to borrow my thunder.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman's thunder is not worth fulminating or borrowing.

Mr. HOUK. I think the gentleman by using my thunder shows himself very destitute of arrows in his quiver.

The amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

Mr. BRADY. I wish to ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill a question. Does Mr. Chambliss, for whose relief this bill is reported, draw a pension at the present time, and how much?

Mr. STEELE. We have no information that he draws a pension.

Mr. McMILLIN. It was stated during the debate that he was drawing a pension.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to correct my statement of a moment ago. The report shows that he has a pension.

Mr. BRADY. How much does he draw.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am not informed what his pension is.

Mr. BRADY. I think that is an important question, which should be answered before we vote on the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the pensioning method is the proper one; but if the bill is to pass, my desire was that this applicant should not draw retired pay and pension both.

Mr. BRADY. I wish to ask further are there any precedents for the passage of a bill of this kind?

Mr. STEELE. There are a great many of them.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] is in error in giving it to be understood that there are a vast number of precedents for this. Some bills of this kind have been passed and some have been defeated in past Congresses. There have been very few in the last seven years. This is a case where an officer voluntarily retires from the service and then comes and asks to be placed on the retired-list. Of such cases there have been very few before Congress. In some instances there have been attempts to put such persons on the retired-list but they have been defeated.

Mr. BRADY. This seems to be a very meritorious case; but I understand that under the rulings of the Pension Department the pension granted in this case would be ample and would almost reach the amount Mr. Chambliss would receive by being placed on the retired-list.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

V. F. GORRISSEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2428) for the relief of V. F. Gorrissen, reported by Mr. LANHAM from the Committee on Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to V. F. Gorrissen, of Young County, Texas, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $245.33, the same being the amount of money collected from him by the Post-Office Department for and on account of postal funds stolen from the mails after having been registered and mailed by him as postmaster at Graham, Tex., 1882.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask for the reading of the report. It is brief, and I think the reading of it will obviate the necessity of my making any explanation.

The report (by Mr. LANHAM) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2428) for the relief of V. F. Gorrissen, respectfully report in favor of its passage.

The facts of the case are stated in the following report of the late Hon. Reuben Ellwood, who was a member of the Committee on Claims during the Forty-Eighth Congress, and which is hereby adopted:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5843) for the relief of V. F. Gorrissen, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

"This claim is for the payment of $245.33 to V. F. Gorrissen, postmaster at Graham, Tex. It appears that in July, 1882, Mr. Gorrissen forwarded a registered package containing the above amount to the postmaster at Austin, Tex., being the amount due the United States by him, as per his account current for the quarter ending June 30, 1882, and the same was stolen while in transit. The rules of the Post-Office Department require all postmasters to make their deposits in the legal currency of the United States, 'notes or coin;' bank-checks must not be used. It appears from the evidence that Mr. Gorrissen complied in every way with the regulations of the Post-Office Department. The Postmaster-General states that if it be the policy of Congress to pay such claims he thinks that the case of Mr. Gorrissen is a deserving one. Mr. Thomas, the post-office inspector who made a thorough investigation of the case, states that it seems to him but just that Mr. Gorrissen should have the relief claimed.

"Your committee, after a careful consideration of this claim, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass."

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

L. S. ENSEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 290) for the relief of L. S. Ensel, reported by Mr. SPRINGER from the Committee on Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay L. S. Ensel, of Springfield, Ill., the sum of $1,054.22, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the same being the amount paid by the said Ensel and covered into the Treasury of the United States as security on the recognizance of Michael Heilbron and Bernard Weil, who were indicted and tried in the United States district court for the northern district of Illinois, under clause 9 of section 5132 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BURROWS. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read in my time.

The report (by Mr. SPRINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 290) for the relief of L. S. Ensel, submit the following report:

This bill was reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary, and was passed by the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses. The facts were found and reported in the reports heretofore adopted, and are as follows, and made a part of this report, namely:

"It appears from the evidence that on the 1st day of November, 1876, Michael Heilbron and Bernard Weil were indicted by the United States grand jury in the northern district of Illinois, under the ninth clause or subdivision of section 5132 of chapter 8 of Revised Statutes, which is as follows, to wit:

"'SEC. 5132. Every person respecting whom proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced, either upon his own petition or upon that of a creditor— * * * Ninth. Who, within three months before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, under the false color, pretense of carrying on business, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, obtains on credit from any person any goods and chattels with intent to defraud, * * * shall be punishable by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for not more than three years.'

"On the 13th of December following the defendants entered into recognizance in the sum of $1,000, with said L. S. Ensel as their surety. A trial was had upon the indictment in the district court of said district, by jury, commencing on the 7th of February, 1877, and resulted in a verdict of guilty on the 10th of the same month. Pending the deliberation of the jury the defendants fled and their recognizance was forfeited. Suit was thereafter brought in said court against said Ensel on the forfeited bail bond, and judgment rendered against him thereon, on the 19th day of May, 1877, for $1,000 and costs.

"On this judgment said Ensel paid from time to time to the United States district attorney at Chicago various sums, beginning June 27, 1877, and ending November 1, 1877, the whole amounting to $930, and subsequently, June 12, 1878, to the United States marshal, the balance claimed, to wit, $121.67, and the whole sum so paid was on the 28th of June, 1878, covered into the United States Treasury.

"Meantime, and at the October term, 1877, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the ninth clause or subdivision of section 5132 is unconstitutional. (United States vs. FOX, 5 Otto.) In conformity with the principles established by that case the court in which said indictment was pending did, April 15, 1879, on motion in arrest of judgment, quash the indictment, on which no final judgment had been entered, on account of the absence of defendants, as above stated. Mr. Ensel, as soon as he learned the state of the case, applied to have the money refunded, but was told it was already covered into the Treasury and his only relief was from Congress.

"Your committee, therefore, are of the opinion that said Ensel should have refunded to him, out of the Treasury of the United States, $1,054.22, and recommend the passage of the bill as amended, to wit, in place of $1,075 insert $1,054.22.

"The following letter relating to the subject of this report is made a part thereof:

"UNITED STATES ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
"Chicago, January 16, 1878.

"SIR: Respecting the subject of a letter received from Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER (which letter is inclosed herewith), I beg to report as follows:

"On the 1st day of November, 1876, Michael Heilbron and Bernard Weil were indicted by the United States grand jury for this district. The indictment contained eight counts, under the ninth clause of section 5132, Revised Statutes. On the 13th day of the following December they entered into a recognizance in $1,000, with one L. S. Ensel, of Springfield, Ill., as their surety. Their trial in the district court here by a jury commenced on the 7th of February, 1877, and resulted in a verdict of guilty on the second, fifth, and eighth counts on the 10th of the same month. Pending the deliberations of the jury, and before the verdict, the defendants fled and their recognizance was forfeited.

"On the 19th of March, 1877, the judgment against the surety (Ensel) for $1,000 and costs was made final. On this judgment Ensel has paid $1,054.22, and the same has been duly covered into the Treasury of the United States.

"The Supreme Court of the United States, at the October term, 1877, in the case of the United States vs. FOX, held (as reported in 5 Otto) substantially that the language of the ninth clause did not create a criminal offense. Since that decision the courts here have, in their rulings upon similar cases, conformed to the principles established by that case.

"MARK BANGS, United States Attorney.

"Hon. CHARLES DEVENS,
"Attorney-General, Washington, D. C."

Your committee respectfully recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. It seems this claim is for the return of money that was paid on a forfeited recognizance in the United States court. Subsequently to the declaration of forfeiture the Supreme Court held that the statute upon which the indictment was founded was unconstitutional. The money having been paid before this was ascertained judicially, the surety upon the recognizance claims it should be paid back.

It strikes me there is a very important element in this case that has not been ascertained by the committee at all. I have no doubt that the money which the surety paid, which has gone into the United States Treasury, was furnished by the defendants themselves.

Mr. SPRINGER. I can assure the gentleman it was not.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I wanted that question to be settled by the ascertainment of the committee. I know how these things are done. These gentlemen defrauded their creditors in the first place, cheated them, and disappear when they are indicted; a friend comes up and becomes their surety, and when the bonds are forfeited the money is paid by the surety. He is generally paid by the defendants themselves, who have simply diappeared temporarily from the community till the storm blows over. I shall not vote for this measure until the committee has inquired into this phase of the case. I do not want these scoundrels simply to have their money returned from the Treasury of the United States, if they paid it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to disabuse the mind of my distinguished friend from Indiana on that point. It appears from the facts reported by the district attorney at Chicago, Mr. Bangs, that the defendants were put on trial, that the trial lasted two or three days, and that the jury brought in a verdict of guilty against the defendants; and while the case was in court, and while the parties were before the jury, when the verdict was rendered and this surety was not present and had no knowledge of these proceedings before the judgment of the court was pronounced, it was discovered the defendants were not in the room; that they had left after the verdict of guilty was announced by the jury.

The security, who lived in Springfield, not in Chicago, was informed of the forfeited recognizance, and judgment was entered against him, and he had to pay the amount. The parties afterward came back into court, entered their appearance, and moved to quash the indictment on the ground of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on an indictment founded upon the same section of the statute. In that case the Supreme Court held that the clause in the statute on which the indictment was found did not set forth an indictable offense, and dismissed the proceeding as void from the beginning.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I understand that perfectly well; but when, subsequently, an order to quash the indictments was made, were the defendants present?

Mr. SPRINGER. They came in and entered their appearance.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I supposed so. Now let me ask the gentleman whether these defendants are not legally liable to the security for the money he paid on their account?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not see that they are.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is there not a subsisting legal right on the part of the security to recover against them the amount he paid for them?

Mr. SPRINGER. The fact is that this gentleman, the security, had no interest in the suit or proceeding at all; he was not even suspected of being a party to it. He lived in Springfield; these were parties with whom he had been friendly, who were engaged in business and were indicted under the bankrupt law for some irregularity.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman sees my point. In the first place I want it known to the committee that these parties have not reimbursed the security—the claimant here. Secondly, I want to know whether there is not to-day, on the part of these principals, a legal liability to the surety who paid this money at their instance and request? May not that money be recovered from them? Now I do not apprehend that the committee is overwhelmed with anxiety to return this money to these men who were put on trial and subsequently ran away to avoid the consequences of the verdict of the jury, and staid away until they found that the Supreme Court had taken the teeth out of the indictment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] that this bill has twice passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote. It was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in the Forty-seventh Congress (the report having been prepared by Mr. Willits, of Michigan), and it was passed unanimously by the Judiciary Committee of that House and by the House itself.

It was also introduced in the last Congress and referred to the Judiciary Committee—that committee having had cognizance of such cases before the change of the rules—and it was favorably reported to the House by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Moulton], placed upon the Calendar, and unanimously passed by the last House. So the gentleman will see that this bill has now been twice passed by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, and twice by the House, without a single objection. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this claimant has been seeking the only remedy that was held out to him, and has been seeking it long enough to be entitled to relief, this being the third time that he has come before Congress and asked the passage of this bill.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PETERS. After the forfeiture of this recognizance, if an alias warrant had been issued for these defendants and they had been brought in and had been tried and found not guilty because of the unconstitutionality of the law, would that have released the security?

Mr. SPRINGER. Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, has stated (if the gentleman desires I will send for the book and cite the exact language) that where an indictment is founded upon an unconstitutional provision of a statute all the proceedings from the beginning are void, and that not even the officer who made the arrest can be protected, from the fact that there was no law upon which the man could be indicted or arrested. In this case there was no valid proceeding from the beginning—nothing upon which these defendants could properly be held to answer. This indictment, then, having been founded upon a provision of law which did not constitute an indictable offense, the officers were trespassers, the court had no right to hold the defendants, and all the proceedings bringing them into court were void. It was held in the State of Illinois by the supreme court in a case where an officer was killed in attempting to execute the law, that the person killing him acted in self-defense, because it turned out that the warrant under which the officer was proceeding was void.

Mr. PETERS. The principle there is entirely different.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is the same principle announced twice heretofore by the Committee on the Judiciary and now by the Committee on Claims which has reported this bill; and the gentleman from Kansas will certainly recognize the correctness of that principle, because he has been a judge upon the bench himself.

Mr. PETERS. I recognize the correctness of that principle, Mr. Chairman, but I do not recognize the correctness of this application of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman knows that if a grand jury in his court should indict a man for an alleged offense, which turned out to be no offense at all under the law, he would discharge the recognizance; he would not undertake to collect the money, and if he did collect he would be gathering where he had not sown, he would be mulcting a citizen on a liability that had no legal existence.

Mr. OATES. If all the proceedings were void by reason of the unconstitutionality of the law, was there any legal method by which the surety could be compelled to pay this money, or was not the payment voluntary?

Mr. SPRINGER. This man paid the money because he was a good citizen, and thought he was liable to pay it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He paid it before the decision of the court.

Mr. SPRINGER. He paid it before the decision was rendered; and the district attorney said to him that he regretted very much he could not return the money, but that it had been covered into the Treasury of the United States; and he recommended that this claimant make application for a refund from the Treasury.

I believe my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] was a member of the Judiciary Committee of the last Congress, which reported this bill favorably; and I trust he will not now go back on the honorable record he made at that time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am not responsible for what the Judiciary Committee did.

Mr. SPRINGER. But having been a member of the committee, the gentleman acquiesced in this report—allowed the committee to report the bill unanimously and the House to pass it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I will not say that is not true; but I have not the slightest recollection of the matter.

Mr. PETERS. You were young then.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Young and inexperienced.

Mr. SPRINGER. "An honest confession is good for the soul."

Mr. GOFF. The fact that the Supreme Court decided the act on which the indictment was based to be unconstitutional disposes, as I understand, of the point raised by the gentleman from Indiana that there is an existing liability by which the surety may recover from the principal.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is my understanding.

The question being taken on laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House, there were—ayes 46, noes 10.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. In a House of three hundred and twenty-five members are 46 votes enough to take a thousand dollars out of the Treasury of the United States?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so when no point is made. The ayes have it; and the bill is laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM H. WHEELER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 822) for the relief of William H. Wheeler.

Mr. GEDDES. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL], my colleague on the committee, who reported this bill and has charge of it, is now absent. I ask, therefore, that the bill be laid aside informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside informally because of the absence of the gentleman having charge of it. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVE OF JOHN HATFIELD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 212) for the relief of Albert G. Hatfield.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Alfred G. Hatfield, the legal representative of John Hatfield, deceased, late veterinary surgeon of the Thirteenth Pennsylvania

Cavalry, the sum of $675, in full for services as veterinary surgeon for said regiment for nine months, at $75 per month.

Mr. GEDDES. I desire that this bill be laid aside informally, and that Senate bill No. 296, identical in its provisions with this bill, be taken up and recommended to the House for passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the gentleman move that this bill be reported to the House with a request that it lie on the table, and that the Senate bill be reported with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. EDEN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. GEDDES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 212) for the relief of John Hatfield, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

It appears from the papers in this case that on or about the 1st day of June, 1862, John Hatfield was employed by James A. Gallagher, then colonel commanding the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, in the military service of the Government of the United States, to act as veterinary surgeon for said regiment. At the date of the employment of John Hatfield by Colonel Gallagher veterinary surgeons were not allowed by law; but from affidavits of officers of the regiment and others it appears that the necessity existed for the employment of one. There were at that time eight or nine hundred horses in the regiment, and many of them were affected with distemper and other diseases, and required the care and attention of a skillful and competent veterinary surgeon. John Hatfield is shown to have been qualified, and as such had charge of all the horses of said regiment, under instructions from and the authority of Colonel Gallagher, from the date of his employment as aforesaid until the 3d day of March, 1863, a period of nine months, and he was paid nothing for his services rendered during that time, although the promise of payment was often repeated by Colonel Gallagher.

From papers on file in the War Department it appeared that John Hatfield, in December, 1863, presented his claim for payment as veterinary surgeon for nine months, being the time he had acted as such under the authority of Colonel Gallagher. There was no law authorizing the employment of veterinary surgeons during said nine months, and on that ground his claim to that extent was rejected.

Veterinary surgeons were authorized by law from March 3, 1863, and a warrant was issued in his favor January 2, 1864, to date from March 3, 1863.

From the 3d of March, 1863, until he quit the service he received $75 per month, that being the compensation for veterinary surgeons provided by the act of Congress approved on the said 3d day of March, 1863.

It being clearly proved that Hatfield rendered valuable and efficient services during the nine months he acted without technical authority of law, but under the authority of an officer of the Government, thereby saving the Government from great loss, and as the necessity actually existed for his employment, your committee are of the opinion that a reasonable compensation should be paid therefor, and we find $75 per month just and reasonable.

Your committee therefore report accompanying bill (H. R. 212) with amendments, and recommend that it do pass.

The Senate bill was as follows:

A bill (S. 296) for the relief of the legal representative of John Hatfield, deceased.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of John Hatfield, deceased, late veterinary surgeon of the Thirteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, the sum of $675, in full, for services as veterinary surgeon for said regiment for nine months, at $75 per month.

Mr. GEDDES. The report just read presents the case of this claimant very fully and fairly, and unless there be some objection, I move that the Senate bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House, and that the House bill be reported with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

A. S. BLOOM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 899) for the relief of A. S. Bloom.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to A. S. Bloom, late a major of the Seventh Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the pay and allowances of a major of cavalry from January 20, 1864, until November 1, 1864, deducting therefrom any moneys paid him for any other position held during that period.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 7 strike out "January 20" and insert "September 2."

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Unless there be objection I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky why this claim could not be adjusted under the general law passed a year or two ago authorizing the Secretary of War to amend the military record of a soldier so as to allow him compensation for the period he actually served without being mustered into the service.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. If the report in this case had been read, it would have shown why this claim can not be adjusted under the law of June 3, 1884. The claim has been presented to the War Department under that act and decided adversely, because—

During the period claimed the Seventh Regiment Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers was reduced beyond the minimum strength allowed by law, and consequently not entitled to a third major.

It is clearly shown by the proof in this case that Major Bloom did service under the orders of General Rousseau from September 2 until November 1, 1864, at which time his pay began regularly. This bill simply proposes that he be allowed two months' pay for service which he actually rendered in a part of the country where, we have been told to-day, there was no danger, but where, as I happen to know from my experience as an eye-witness, there was danger to soldiers on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

A. GATES LEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4411) for the relief of A. Gates Lee.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army the alleged use, occupation, and damage by the United States authorities, for the use of the United States troops, during the late war, of a certain mill property, situated in McCracken County, in the State of Kentucky, alleged to have been the property of A. Gates Lee; such investigation to extend to the title of the property, the status of the owner, whether loyal or not, the value of the property destroyed, the actual rental value of the property for the time it was occupied by United States troops, the amount of damage arising from the appropriation of material to the use of the Army; and when such investigation shall be completed the Secretary of War shall report the result thereof, with his recommendation thereon, to Congress, for action in the premises.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report in this case will be read.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The claimant in this case was one of two brothers, whose mill, at Paducah, Ky., was taken and used by the Federal Army during the late war. The proof in the case shows that they were both loyal. All that the bill asks is, not pay for the mill, but, as the case is one of peculiar hardship, that it be investigated by the Adjutant-General and the facts reported to Congress by the War Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me this claim ought to go to the Court of Claims, which has the means of taking proof in such cases. There is no propriety in sending it to the Adjutant-General, who has no facilities for investigating such matters. He is not authorized to send for persons and papers or to send an agent to take testimony at the place where the parties may reside.

We have provided in this class of cases that the Court of Claims shall inquire into the facts. And my friend will see it is far better this case should go to the Court of Claims rather than be the subject of investigation by an officer having no facilities to make such investigation.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It seems to me from my examination of this case that the War Department is as proper a place as can be found to report to Congress upon the facts. All the bill provides is that the War Department shall report for the action of Congress how long this property was occupied by the Government, and what the rental of the property was worth during the time of such occupancy. These are all the facts necessary to be ascertained for the action of Congress, for there is no question as to the man's loyalty or that the property was used.

I move the bill be reported to the House for passage without amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. How long was this property occupied, and to what extent was it destroyed?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. It was flour-mill property, and was occupied from the time the troops went to Paducah, late in 1861, up to some time in 1863. The property for mill purposes was almost entirely destroyed. There were two brothers of the name of Lee who owned the property. One is now dead. The other, A. Gates Lee, is the surviving brother.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This may be a very meritorious claim, but the report discloses but few facts.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Those are the facts of the case.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I investigated this claim. This mill was occupied by Federal troops from the fall of 1861, about the time that Paducah was held. At the close of its occupancy a commission was appointed to investigate the damage to this mill, which resulted in a report of eleven thousand and odd dollars as the amount of damage done to the mill. The Quartermaster-General held properly that the Government could not pay for property destroyed by the soldiers. The mill was completely gutted—all its machinery taken out; it was destroyed for use for milling purposes. The Quartermaster-General offered $25 per month rent, which Mr. Lee declined to receive.

Now, the Court of Claims can not investigate this case under the Bowman act, because it is expressly precluded from considering such questions.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The statute of limitations would.

Mr. ROWELL. This claim has been in the War Department. Proper parties at Paducah investigated it. They reported these damages.

But, sir, this bill does not propose to pay for any damages or for any depredations, but authorizes the War Department, which has its quartermasters and its agents with full power to investigate all the facts—to investigate the rental value and the value of any kind of property taken and used by the Army, and report them back to Congress. It does not appropriate any money, but simply asks Congress as an act of justice to the Lees to investigate the case and report the facts to Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is all right.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, there does not seem to be any dispute about the facts. I presume neither the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] nor the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] will pretend there is any dispute about the facts; that the property was occupied by the Government, that it was occupied at the seat of war, and that it was damaged while occupied by the Government. The House considered very carefully and so did the Senate the principles of the Bowman law, and declared that court could not take jurisdiction of any claim where it appeared it was either for occupation of property or for spoliation done at the seat of war. The only question is whether it is now deemed advisable to go behind the principle decided upon and open up this class of claims to adjustment. That is the only question before the House. If it is designed to reverse the action of Congress, then very well and good; let us know it.

I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether there is anything in this claim which in his judgment calls upon Congress to depart from the general proposition which has governed Congress up to this hour—that the Government could not pay for property destroyed by the Army or Navy at the seat of war, or for property occupied by the Army or Navy at the seat of war. Does he think it is proper to go back of that policy which has governed us up to this time, and propose to pay that class of claims?

Mr. ROWELL. I will answer the gentleman's question. Paducah, situated on the south side of the Ohio River, was taken possession of early in the war, not because there were enemies there, but because it might become necessary for the defense of the nation.

It was not in the position of property taken possession of farther South by the Army, property in the enemy's country, and was taken possession of because of the exigency arising at the time when Colonel Smith and Colonel Wallace went in the fall of 1861 and took possession of Paducah. Not being supplied with tents, they took possession of this mill for quarters. It should have been paid for at the time, but was not, and afterward a provision was inserted in the law preventing the adjudication of such claims. It is not a claim of the same character as that to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has referred. I would be as much opposed as the gentleman from Indiana himself to the adjudication of the claim if it had been for the occupancy of a building down in the enemy's country. But Paducah was really no more in the enemy's country during that period than was the district the gentleman himself represents here, and consequently the case stands on a very different footing from property which was taken possession of down in the enemy's country.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman, if I understand the position he takes, bases his argument upon the ground that the case is not reached by the Bowman act, because, in fact, the occupation of this property, and the damage done to it, was not done at the seat of war. Now, let me call the gentleman's attention to a case with which he is no doubt familiar. The gentleman remembers the famous Dr. Best case, which occupied so much time in Congress, and which presented such an interesting question.

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, very well; and I am in favor of paying it.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. And the Wallace case, at Lexington, Mo., is a similar one, and ought to be paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was for the destruction of property by the Federal forces, in the face of military operations, right at Paducah. It was before Congress from time to time, and was a most interesting case, because it was sought to establish one of two doctrines, either that in cases of that character the Government should pay the value of the property on account of the spoliation and occupation of the property, or that it should not. It is a case that presents the whole question. And there is another famous case in Missouri. It was determined that the Government could not enter upon the payment for the occupation of property under these circumstances or for damages done to it. That was the Paducah case, and yet my friend says that it was not at all affected by the Bowman law not being at the seat of war.

Mr. ROWELL. Is it not true that the Best house was destroyed because it was in the line of fire of a fort with the immediate prospect of a battle in front at one time when the enemy got there?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ROWELL. Then it presents a very different case from that which is presented here.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend from Illinois, as I understood him, spoke of that as not being the seat of war.

Mr. ROWELL. Not at the time that this property was in the possession of the Government. Up in Ohio and Indiana it might be said the seat of war existed when Morgan made his raid.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman had some war in his own State, I believe, at one time.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the case is not affected by the Bowman act the gentleman can see that it is a proper question for adjudication by the Court of Claims. If it is affected by the Bowman law, you are calling for facts which when obtained, according to the decision of the Court of Claims uniformly made, can not be used as a basis on which to predicate legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, upon an examination of this bill I find that it is not of the purport I thought it to be at the time of making my first inquiry. I find it is simply to provide for an investigation by the Quartermaster-General's Department of the United States Army. The Secretary of War is to cause to be investigated by the Quartermaster-General's Department the questions arising from the alleged use, occupation, or damage by the United States of this property. And then what follows? Not that the accounts shall be adjusted and paid—that bridge we have not yet reached—but simply that "when such investigation shall be completed the Secretary of War shall report the result thereof, with his recommendations thereon, to Congress for its action in the premises." That is all there is of the bill, and if any of us here should be fortunate enough to be in the House when that report comes back, we can then debate the question as to whether the claim shall be paid or not.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I am not here specially to oppose this bill, but I represent a district from Missouri in which there are numberless claims, such as are embodied in this bill, fully as meritorious, that have been pending before the Departments of this Government, which have been brought before this Congress, and no relief has ever been granted. I feel, sir, that it is high time for us to call a halt upon this system of piecemeal legislation, making fish of one and fowl of another. Let the Committee on War Claims bring in a bill authorizing the proper authorities to investigate the facts in all of these cases where relief is asked, that we may have them all before us and act upon them intelligently.

In the case of Lexington, where Wallace's house was destroyed, the troops there occupied the Female Baptist College for two years. The trustees of that college have been knocking at the doors of Congress. They have been before the Quartermaster's Department and before the Secretary of War, and the invariable answer is, wait till some general law is passed by which relief can be granted to you. Therefore I think it is high time the committee having these matters in charge should perfect some legislation by which we can treat all alike, instead of passing bills to allow the claims of the favored few.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There is no member on this floor who would vote more heartily than myself for any bill that could be formulated here that would take all these claims out of the Committee on War Claims and provide a tribunal by which they could be adjudicated without coming to Congress. But these claims come to us by the hundred from every section of the country, and we are expected to discharge our duty as regards the various bills referred to us. We have no election. We can not sit still and allow these claims to wait till we have a general law prepared and passed.

As to this particular claim, whether it shall go to the War Department or the Court of Claims is a question for the House to determine. The claim has been investigated by the War Department and a large sum of money has been found to be due; but the Department feel they have no authority to pay the amount due, and offer these claimants so much per month while the buildings were occupied. The claimants decided not to take this because they believe it is not enough, and they come for relief to the Congress of the United States, and ask you simply to allow the War Department to investigate the case again and determine what is due them and report to Congress, which can then pass a bill making an appropriation.

The whole question seems to hinge on the idea as to where the claim shall go to be investigated. It has been before the War Department. All that is asked is that it shall be allowed to go back there without this additional machinery being added on to the case.

I am one of the class of men who believe as to these claims, if they are honest, you should pay them honestly and not talk about the danger of opening this or the other class of claims. If the Government owes these loyal citizens I do not think Congress should refuse to pay them or refuse to allow the claims to be heard before a tribunal to decide what is due them.

So far as I am individually concerned, I am not a particular stickler or advocate for a general payment of claims. But I do believe, sir, that this Government owes it to the people who were loyal in the border States that just claims should be paid. For I tell you a man who was loyal in the Southern States or the border States during the war deserves more credit than a man who was loyal in Massachusetts. I believe the good faith of the Government demands that it shall righteously adjudge the claims of loyal people in the border States. I believe so long as the Government stands back and refuses to adjust these loyal claims you are not binding the hearts of the people in loyalty to the Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to say that in the remarks I made I was making a plea for the loyal citizens in the border States, more particularly the loyal citizens in the State of Missouri.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. So I understood the gentleman. This claimant was a loyal man. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] sending this claim to the Court of Claims will not be agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not sent up any amendment. I must object, however, I say to my friend from Kentucky, to this mode of legislation. If these claims are to be paid, I hope Congress will say so in direct terms, and not by indirection.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF ANDREW F. M'MILLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 897) for the relief of the heirs at law of Andrew F. McMillin, deceased, reported with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the heirs at law of Andrew F. McMillin, deceased, of Fayette County, Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,050, for fuel taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 7, strike out "$1,050" and insert "$204."

Mr. EDEN. I should like to hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. COMSTOCK) was read, as follows:

Andrew F. McMillin, of Fayette County, Kentucky, on the 29th day of November, 1865, filed in the office of the Quartermaster-General, United States Army, a claim for quartermaster stores supplied to the Army in 1863. He claimed the price and value of 350 cords of wood, at $3 per cord, amounting to $1,050.

It appears from the evidence in the case that since the filing of this claim claimant has died intestate, leaving heirs at law, who inherited his rights, and who continue to urge payment of the claim.

The evidence discloses that the Quartermaster-General investigated the claim through an agent, who found in favor of the claimant—

First. That he was loyal.

Second. That a detachment of the Army in 1863 encamped on claimant's land and consumed fuel, consisting of planks, posts, and rails; that at the time referred to the claimant resided on a tract of land adjacent to the city limits of Lexington, in said State.

After a careful investigation of the case the agent of the Department was unable to find the quantity of stores furnished to the Army as stated by claimant, but from the evidence before him reported in favor of claimant 34 cords of wood at $6 per cord, amounting to $204, and in submitting said report, at the conclusion of the same, said agent uses the following language:

"Under all the circumstances I am satisfied compensation should be made, and therefore respectfully recommend the payment of the amount as found."

This case illustrates the serious difficulty after such a lapse of time to ascertain with absolute certainty amounts and value of property alleged to have been taken and used by the Army. The claimant by his own affidavit and several other affidavits corroborating him insists that he furnished 350 cords of wood at the time mentioned; other testimony and circumstances tend to show the quantity largely overestimated by the claimant.

In view of this conflict in the evidence and the extreme difficulty at this late day of rebutting such claim, your committee find it more satisfactory to adopt the report of the agent of the Quartermaster's Department as to quantity and value, and therefore report the accompanying bill (H. R. 897) with the following amendment: Strike out "one thousand and fifty" and insert "two hundred and four;" and recommend its passage.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It strikes me this is a bill to which the House should give some attention. There is a claim for 350 cords of wood at $3 a cord—a claim put in under affidavit. The committee find there were 34 cords at $6 a cord; an agent of the Quartermaster's Department found the same thing. It may be some compensation should be voted to the claimant in this case. But I think where claimants come in and defraud the Government in this way they should be turned away from these halls without being allowed a cent.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, if I read the report aright, the committee find that this party is entitled to be paid for 34 cords of wood at $6 a cord, and that he put in a claim for 350 cords of wood at $3 a cord, never asking for pay at $6 a cord, but only at the rate of $3. In addition to that he claims for "wood," which must be taken to mean cord-wood, while the committee allow him for posts and fence-rails. I think there are very suspicious circumstances connected with this claim and I shall vote against it.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend the gentlemen are mistaken when they say that this claim is an attempt to defraud the Government. I think they do not understand the circumstances of the case. The fact is, the soldiers of the Union Army just went into the forests there (and they have very beautiful forests about Lexington) and cut down whatever they pleased, and when this gentleman charged $3 a cord it was doubtless for wood that the soldiers cut. It appears, however, that the Government officers would not allow him anything for wood that the soldiers had cut. Now, it is all very well for gentlemen to say that this is a false claim, to guess that it is a false claim, without any ground to guess on. It is proved that the Army did get 34 cords of this gentleman's wood, and of course the proof as to how much they got determines the amount he should be paid for. But, Mr. Chairman, this may, nevertheless, be a perfectly just claim, and I know just exactly how the whole thing could happen. The soldiers went in there and cut down his wood in the forest, and then they took his fence-rails and burned them up—for who does not know how proverbial the soldiers were for burning fences on a cold night? [Laughter.] They took his wood and they took his fences and they took everything they wanted, but of course he could not prove that the Government got anything.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman explain why the committee have doubled the price of this wood?

Mr. WOLFORD. Because the soldiers took the man's rails and fence-posts instead of wood in the forest. Anybody can understand that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] is not justified in assuming that this claim is an attempt to defraud the Government. I know nothing of the facts of the case myself, but I knew very well the old gentleman whose representatives are the beneficiaries of this claim, as did my colleague on the other side from the Maysville district. Mr. McMillin in his old age removed from the county of Harrison to the county of Fayette, and lived near the city of Lexington, and this claim arose during the occupancy of his own and adjoining places by the Federal troops. It is probably not improper for me to say that during that time I was not practicing law in Lexington and had no opportunity of knowing the facts of this case myself, nor have I examined the papers, but, as I have said, I knew Mr. McMillin exceedingly well, and I know that he was a man utterly incapable of any fraud whatever. That I can say of my personal knowledge of the old gentleman, who has now gone I hope to a better land. He was a man utterly incapable of committing a fraud of any kind, and not only that, but there was no inducement for him to do such a thing, because he was a man of very considerable wealth at that time. I think if the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] will examine the report further he will find this state of facts:

The testimony of Mr. McMillin and others put the loss at about a thousand and some odd dollars. Afterward, when the war was over and the witnesses were out of the way and when estimates could not be accurately made, from the testimony that was then taken the quartermaster came to two conclusions. The first was that compensation should be made, for he says, "Under all the circumstances, I am satisfied compensation should be made, and therefore respectfully recommend," &c. The other was that the amount claimed was greater than the proof showed to be proper, and therefore the quartermaster recommended the allowance of a very much smaller sum. The committee make a very wise and sensible suggestion when they say that this case illustrates, in this view, the extreme difficulty at this late day of rebutting a claim of this kind.

But the same difficulty that exists of rebutting exists also, on the other hand, of perpetuating or obtaining testimony to establish such a claim. So that this is one of those cases growing out of the war where persons on the ground, making their estimates at the time and from personal knowledge, came to one conclusion, while subsequently officers investigating the cases upon other testimony, given by persons not personally cognizant of all the facts, reach other conclusions. Saying this much, I think it proper to say further, that the conclusion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] that this claim is a fraud is a mistake. It is simply one of those cases of conflict of testimony which are quite common, and which naturally grow out of the state of things existing in war. May I be permitted to add—for I know something of the condition of things there, although I was not at Lexington except at irregular and infrequent intervals, when I, with certain gentlemen with whom I was connected, came up from where we were spending our time in the Southern country and revisited our homes, but did not stay long [laughter]—may I be permitted to add that in the then existing condition of things there were circumstances in all cases of this kind which rendered it exceedingly difficult to get at the facts. The Federal troops used Lexington as headquarters for a very large military department. It was the entrepôt for their provisions and their army stores; it was the resting-place of the regiments that had been in campaigns, and it was the place of preparation for the regiments that were getting ready to go into campaigns; it was the point at which preparations were made for raids like that of General Burbridge and General Stoneman; it was a place where thousands of men were coming and going continually, so that the same camp would not be long occupied by the same regiment, brigade, or division, seldom longer than a few weeks. Now, the use of materials of all kinds during that time was by these various commands, extending over a period of months. The encampment at the south side near the old fair grounds (which were entirely destroyed by that encampment) continued for probably a couple of years, and was occupied by thirty, forty, perhaps one hundred, possibly two hundred, different military organizations from various States.

Now, the claimant obtained his testimony from persons in the immediate neighborhood who were acquainted with the facts, while as a rule the quartermaster obtained his not from that source, but by getting the names of persons in the various regiments and applying to them for information. In that way it sometimes happened that the colonel of a regiment would give the quartermaster information as to what supplies had been taken during his occupancy of the camp, extending, perhaps, only over two or three weeks, while the claimant was seeking compensation for supplies furnished or damages sustained during a period of several months, covering the occupancy of the encampment by various other regiments.

So there would be an apparent discrepancy, which would be accounted for by the fact that the testimony in one case covered a period very much longer than that covered by the testimony in the other. I take it for granted this is a case of that kind; that at this point near Mr. MCMILLIN'S, where there was a permanent encampment, these things were used; and I judge they were not only cord-wood but fences; for from some little knowledge on this subject I presume that when the soldiers, whether they wore the blue or the gray, wanted fuel on a cold night, or the quartermaster wanted it for them, those who took the wood were not very particular as to the measurement of the quantity they took or as to the precise form in which they found the wood. I presume, therefore, in this case wood was taken in various ways.

The only question, then, is whether this loyal man should receive pay for these things taken and used by the Federal soldiery at that time. And I may be permitted to add a single thought to what my colleague and friend and old comrade from Kentucky has said. The Union men of Kentucky—and I may speak of them with some little knowledge, because I lived under the roof-tree of one who was probably the most ultra and (saying it with a memory that is pathetic as to him) one of the most useful—the Union men of Kentucky during that unhappy period were subject to things from which probably, in view of the necessities of the war, they could not be free, but which were sometimes very galling. Their supplies were taken, their provender was taken. A wagon would drive up to their corn-cribs or their hay-stacks and their corn or hay would be loaded upon the wagon; and in the same way wheat would be taken from garners. The parties taking these things sometimes left a voucher, and sometimes they did not. And when a voucher was left it was not always a correct voucher. During those years of the war this was the experience of numbers of people in the portion of the country where I lived; and I can afford to bear this testimony because I did not agree with the persons to whom it occurred; I did not share their opinions. I was doing all I could to make them live under a government that was not taking their corn and their hay under those circumstances.

After the war the persons from whom these things had been taken knew how much had been taken. These vouchers—probably sometimes honestly meant to be correct and sometimes not meant to be correct—were brought up to show what had apparently been taken; and there was a discrepancy. Anybody who has taken the trouble to examine knows it frequently happened that the evidence on one side showed a certain amount taken and on the other side a certain other amount. But on deeper examination it would probably be ascertained that the evidence showing the smaller amount was only those vouchers, while the record of the amount received and turned in would come very near to what the claimants themselves proved.

I make this statement simply that the House may understand the general nature of these claims. I know nothing about this particular case except what is in the papers. The old man died many years ago; his son lives in my town; I know him very well; I presume he knows nothing whatever about these facts, for judging from his age he must have been a small boy at the time of these occurrences. The testimony as to the amount is that of persons most of whom, I presume, are dead; and the question now is simply whether that which was taken by the Government shall not be paid for in any amount because the testimony taken by the quartermaster indicates that the claimants ask for too much—in other words, whether the Government shall seize and use the property of loyal men in time of war, and because the party from whom the property was taken claims more than the Government witnesses say he was entitled to he shall not be paid a cent for what was taken. That is the proposition.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask why this claim was not settled by the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I can not answer that question; I did not look into the papers, but judge from the report the reason was that the claim may have been filed so late as possibly to have been barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. BURROWS. Perhaps some gentleman here can state why the claim was not paid.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am not aware why it was not paid.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is stated in the report, as the gentleman will see, that the Quartermaster's Department did investigate this claim, and recommended that the amount be reduced from $1,050 to $204.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. And recommended the payment of that amount?

Mr. SPRINGER. And recommended the payment of that amount, which is the amount recommended by the bill as amended. The claimant desired to be paid $1,050.

Mr. BURROWS. If the agent who investigated the matter recommended that the amount be paid why did not the Quartermaster's Department pay it?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Without knowing anything of this particular case, I judge it was not paid for want of an appropriation. In a great many cases examined by the Quartermaster's Department payment was recommended, but there was no appropriation and the parties were obliged to look to Congress to make an appropriation.

Mr. BRAGG. That explanation could not possibly apply in this case. In all those cases where the Quartermaster-General or his agents investigate a claim and the claim is reported upon favorably it goes to the Auditor and Comptroller, and then comes here reported as allowed by them, and such claims constitute the items of our "4th of July bills," such as that passed here the other day.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. COMSTOCK] who examined the papers can probably explain that matter.

Mr. BRAGG. If the Quartermaster-General recommended the payment of this claim it has either been rejected by the Auditor or Comptroller, or else it belongs on the bill to which I referred.

Mr. SPRINGER. Perhaps I can explain the matter. The party here claimed $1,050, and the Quartermaster-General recommended the payment of only $204.

Mr. BRAGG. But that occurs in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred that come from the Quartermaster's Department and after examination by the Auditor and Comptroller are reported to Congress for allowance.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the party, it seems, has declined to take the $204.

Mr. BRAGG. But the gentleman is entirely mistaken in supposing that would make any difference. The papers, in cases where an allowance is made by the Quartermaster's Department and is approved by the Auditor and Comptroller, come to this House and an appropriation is made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the gentleman from Wisconsin mistaken in supposing that a claim growing out of a contract would go into the bill to which he has referred?

Mr. BRAGG. If the claim arises under a contract, that is "a horse of another color" entirely.

Mr. SPRINGER. This claimant is insisting that the Government owes him $1,050, but the committee has reported in favor of allowing him only $204.

The amendment was adopted, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CUTCHEON moved the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar and had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

JOHN HOLLINS M'BLAIR.

The SPEAKER. The question first recurs on bill (S. 193) for the relief of John Hollins McBlair, reported back with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BRAGG. I demand the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to state that if the House will now adjourn or take a recess, so the pension business may be attended to this evening, business I think will be facilitated. I shall ask the House for a yea-and-nay vote on this McBlair bill, and that will carry it beyond the hour at which the recess should be taken.

Mr. BRAGG. Let the previous question be ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. On the passage of the bill?

Mr. BRAGG. On the third reading and passage of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to that if it is agreed that we will then take a recess until half past 7 o'clock.

Mr. BRAGG. I insist upon the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to recommit the bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order pending the demand for the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood the previous question was demanded on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It has not been read a third time yet.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BRAGG. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report to the House the cause of the disability of the claimant.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the gentleman had better reduce it to writing.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same.

A bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department.

Mr. SPRINGER's motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) was called to order by Mr. RICHARDSON, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1886.

SIR: I hereby designate Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON Speaker pro tempore, to preside at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk wil read the order under which the House assembles to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

Mr. WINANS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills under the special order just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideraton of the Private Calendar under the special order just read. The Clerk will report the first bill.

FRANCES M'NEIL POTTER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1625) for the relief of Frances McNeil Potter.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, to increase the pension of Frances McNeil Potter, daughter of the late General John McNeil, United States Army, from twenty to forty dollars per month, said increase to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The committee recommended the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out, in the seventh line, the word "forty" and insert the word "thirty."

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, as the committee will perceive the bill reported by the committee in this case is for the increase of the pension of Mrs. Frances McNeil Potter from $20 to $30 a month. The facts upon which the committee recommend the increase are disclosed in the report, which was read at the last Friday evening session of the House for the consideration of these bills. I know of no other facts than those disclosed in that report.

These facts, Mr. Chairman, are historical, and show that Mrs. Potter is the daughter of General John McNeil, of New Hampshire. General McNeil devoted the most of his life to the service of his country. He was engaged in a number of wars in defense of his country and participated in a number of battles. He was a conspicuous figure at the battle of Chippewa, where his conduct in making a flank movement was decisive of the fortunes of that battle. General Scott spoke of him in the highest terms on that occasion, and it was his opinion, as well as the opinion of General Jesup, that his conduct in making that flank movement secured victory to the American arms. He was afterward engaged in the battle of Lundy's Lane, another historical battle, and was there severely wounded and made a cripple for life. He was brevetted from the rank of captain to that of brigadier-general, and was brevetted twice in the space of twenty days for conspicuous gallantry on the field of battle. These are the facts connected with his history. He is the father of the lady recommended for this increase of pension.

Now, as to the policy of Congress in a matter of this kind in granting such pensions, it is sufficiently established in the action of Congress itself in this very case.

This is not an application for a pension in the first instance. A previous Congress has extended the benefit of the pension law to this lady; and this bill asks only the small pittance of $10 per month addition to the pension already granted. She is now a widow and is much older than when the pension was granted; is more destitute and dependent than when the United States Congress first conferred this pension upon her, and she is more in need of it. It can not be said that this establishes a precedent. The precedent is already established; but whenever similar cases arise it will be a good precedent. Whenever another John McNeil leaves a daughter in similar circumstances this would be and ought to be a precedent.

Mr. HAYNES. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that much more may be said in behalf of the lady who is the applicant in this case than has been said by the gentleman from Alabama who has just taken his seat or than appears in the report of the committee. I find there is an impression upon the minds of some of the members that this is my bill. It is not, but I take a special interest in it. This old lady is a constituent of mine in a certain sense. In the days of her married life she was a resident in the city of Manchester, where I also reside, and I was acquainted with her family. But beyond all personal considerations that might influence me I feel, as a New Hampshire man, as a New Hampshire Representative, that when the daughter of old John McNeil—John McNeil of Chippewa and of Lundy's Lane—comes before this Congress with a little claim she has a right to a favorable word from her Representative.

As has been said by the gentleman from Alabama, he was one of the heroic figures of the war of 1812. It was a war in which we needed heroic figures upon land; for, notwithstanding the fact that our sailors on the ocean and the lakes won victories which reflected the highest credit on the American name and on our arms, still the course of our armies—the campaigns upon the land—was altogether different. It was a period in the war when Hull had surrendered; when American troops misbehaved themselves; when the capital city of the United States became the prey of the enemy, and when this very building in which we are now assembled was left by them a mass of blackened ruins. In all the history of that war there were but few bright points that we can pick out as Americans, and John McNeil's heroism was one of them. Two of the brightest and most illustrious exhibitions of American valor were his gallantry in the battle of Chippewa, and more particularly at the battle of Lundy's Lane—which is only incidentally alluded to in this report—Lundy's Lane, where almost every commissioned officer of his regiment was killed or wounded, and when he, with his thigh crushed by a grape-shot, was made a cripple for life.

But, sir, there are other facts than those alluded to in this report or by the gentleman from Alabama to which I wish to call attention. This lady who is the applicant here has other claims upon the Government. She comes of a race of heroes in every root and branch of the family tree.

She is a grandniece of old Benjamin Pierce, who served for seven years in the Continental Army and who closed up his military career by letting daylight through a British officer in New York who dared to make fun in his presence of the "blasted Yankees." She is a niece of Franklin Pierce, once President of the United States, and however much some of us here may disagree with Franklin Pierce on matters dead and gone, I, as a New Hampshire man, stand ready to defend his military fame and integrity. I stand here ready to bear testimony to his gallantry when he led Scott's Reserves from the coast to Pueblo, and to defend the bravery he exhibited in every battle in Mexico, culminating in the storming of Chapultepec, when he was requested to dismount because riding he was a target for the enemy, and he made this reply, "The more bullets there are for me the less there are for the men."

The brother of this same lady, it occurs to me, John McNeil, jr., bearing his father's name, was in his country's service, and died in his country's service many years ago, and is buried in the Congressional Cemetery. Her son or possibly stepson, for I am not sure whether or not she was the second wife of her husband, Judge Potter, and her only male support, was Drown Potter, whom I knew at Manchester. He was killed early in the war.

These are some of the additional claims that occur to me beyond what appear in the report of the committee. These are matters known to me as a New Hampshire man, and I give them to the House in order that there may be no more quibbling about voting this additional $10. We can each of us vote this $10 and go home without fear of bankrupting the Treasury.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to add but a word or two to what my colleague has said in support of this bill. By examining this report it will be discovered that when General John McNeil died in 1850—and he died in this city—his death was fittingly taken notice of by both Houses of Congress, and eulogies were pronounced in both Houses of Congress concerning the gallantry and heroism of this brave man. I desire to say further that Mrs. Potter is now a widow, in destitute circumstances. She is a woman quite advanced in years, and a woman whose sole support is the pension she derives from the country her heroic father so ably defended.

I was surprised in reading the RECORD of last Saturday to find that objections were made on this floor to pensioning the daughter of a soldier. As the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has properly said, the precedent was established when this woman and other daughters of soldiers were pensioned long years ago. We have in my own State a good many instances of daughters of soldiers who to-day are drawing pensions from the Government, and properly so, as I believe. In my own State there is a case where two daughters of a soldier have been drawing pensions for ten years, the daughters of General Miller, who, like General McNeil, distinguished himself in the war of 1812, and did much to save the country from the overthrow which threatened it in that war. I think the principle has been established that this Government can properly pension daughters as well as widows of soldiers. When this lady was pensioned that precedent was established, as far as she is concerned; and she simply comes here and asks this additional pittance from this great and generous Government of ours, that she may keep herself from destitution and want in her old age. And I feel sure the generous Representatives here of a generous Government will not refuse for a moment to bestow this pittance on the deserving daughter of a noble and heroic father.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would suggest that if the friends of this bill will permit us to vote I think we will pass it without objection.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

NANCY J. FREELS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4287) to grant a pension to Nancy J. Freels, widow of Pleasant M. Freels, Company E, Third Tennessee Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Nancy J. Freels, widow of Pleasant M. Freels, late of the above-named regiment, on the pension-rolls, and issue to her a certificate of pension, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R.

4287) to grant a pension to Nancy J. Freels, widow of Pleasant M. Freels, late of Company E, Third Tennessee Infantry Volunteers, having carefully considered the same, submit the following report:

Pleasant M. Freels enlisted as private in Company E, Third Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, February 12, 1862, and was discharged from said service December 26, 1862, and died August 3, 1877, and left surviving him, as his widow, Nancy J. Freels, who filed claim for pension March 31, 1880, and her claim was rejected June 18, 1884, without the reason therefor being given.

The soldier was discharged on a certificate of disability from surgeon of his regiment, showing him to be "permanently incapable of performing duties of a soldier because of carditis, resulting from chronic rheumatism."

The evidence shows that the soldier was healthy and free from disease when he enlisted, and that he became disabled and broken down in health from exposure and hardships while in the service and in the line of duty, and while a prisoner of war, from which he never recovered.

He is shown by the official records to have suffered and received medical treatment, while a soldier, for heart disease, the result of rheumatism contracted while a prisoner of war, and the evidence shows that he died of typhoid fever, which was the result of his generally broken down and bad condition of health, and that he had been in very bad health from the date of discharge until the day of his death, receiving almost constant medical treatment.

Your committee agree in recommending the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PETERS. I ask that the reports accompanying these bills be printed in the RECORD where they are not read as well as where they are read.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think that is a good suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the reports, although the reading may not be called for, will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

EDGAR PAYNE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 837) granting a pension to Edgar Payne.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Edgar Payne, late of Company B, One hundred and ninth Regiment United States Colored Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 837) granting a pension to Edgar Payne, having considered the same, submit the following report:

Edgar Payne enlisted as a sergeant in Company B, One hundred and ninth United States Colored Troops, June 12, 1864, and was discharged from the service February 6, 1866, and filed claim for pension June 6, 1882, basing his claim on disease of lungs, rheumatism, and chronic diarrhea, contracted in the service and in the line of duty. His claim was rejected February 15, 1884, on the ground of no record and the claimant's declared inability to furnish the testimony of an officer or medical evidence showing the existence of the alleged disease of lungs, chronic diarrhea, and rheumatism in the service or at discharge. Certificate of Adjutant-General on file in the case shows that his regimental hospital records are not on file in his office, hence claimant's inability to furnish the record evidence required.

Claimant shows by his own and the affidavit of Dr. S. K. Vanmeter, who was his family physician before enlistment and who is highly credible, that the said claimant was sound and healthy and free from lung disease or rheumatism at and prior to enlistment.

He shows by the testimony of Richard Buckner and Riley Raybold, comrades, that he was sound and healthy, free from diarrhea, rheumatism, and disease of lungs at and prior to enlistment, and that while in the service and in the line of duty he had divers severe attacks of diarrhea, and that he had also an attack of some kind of fever which resulted in a cough, diarrhea, and rheumatism in his back and limbs, from which he has never recovered, and which has disabled him for manual labor at least one-half.

Dr. Vanmeter also testified that soon after claimant's said discharge he examined him, and found him suffering from chronic diarrhea and a cough, and that he was at that time complaining of rheumatism, from which claimant suffered as long as he treated him, which was for two or three years after his discharge, and from which diseases claimant was incapable of earning a support by manual labor.

Dr. H. P. Cartwright testifies to the existence of the diseases from and after 1881.

Your committee believe that the facts are all well established by reliable evidence; that claimant was healthy and free from disease at the time of enlistment, and that from exposure and hardships while in the service and in the line of duty he contracted the disabilities complained of, from which he has never recovered.

Your committee accordingly recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CALVIN MEANS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 851) for the relief of Calvin Means.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Calvin Means, formerly a member of Company B, Fifteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Calvin Means enlisted as a private in Company B, Fifteenth West Virginia Volunteers, on August 13, 1862, and was discharged on June 14, 1865. Filed claim for pension on May 8, 1878, based on chronic diarrhea contracted while in the service and line of duty, on which the Commissioner of Pensions rendered the following decision: "Approved for chronic diarrhea one-fourth to October 10, 1879, and then cease, as disability having ceased."

There can be no doubt about the fact that said soldier contracted chronic diarrhea while in the service and line of duty, and the only question that your committee find in the case detrimental to claim for pension is as to whether or no the said disability has ceased or now exists in a pensionable degree. On this point the proof is full and clear.

It appears from the depositions of divers credible witnesses filed in the case during the year 1883, and from quite an extensive "confidential" correspondence carried on between the department and a number of gentlemen whom the Commissioner of Pensions addressed by letter touching the matter after the rejection of the claim, that claimant was then suffering from said disease to a considerable extent, and there is not the slightest doubt to be cast on this conclusion from the voluminous proof and letters in the case, save a statement of one Mr. Jos. J. Johnson, of East Liverpool, Ohio, who, in a letter of date August 15, 1883, says the disease, in his opinion, was temporary and caused by "gluttony." While he does not by any statement show himself in possession of any means of knowledge as to claimant's condition, your committee are not disposed to give any weight to his mere statement of opinion when not on oath as against such overwhelming proof to the contrary.

Claimant's family physician, who stands indorsed in the record as "credible," testifies on August 3, 1883, that he had known and treated the claimant for ten years, to wit, from 1873 to 1883, and that the claimant has during that time suffered continuously from said disease.

Examining Surgeons M. S. Holt, on the 10th day of October, 1879, and L. R. Charton, on July 15, 1880, certify that they can not from examination find any evidences of said disease; and subsequently, on the 5th day of September, 1883, a full board of examining surgeons certify to the existence of symptoms of disease, and fix the rating at one-eighth total disability.

Your committee is strongly of opinion that said soldier is entitled to a pension. They recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

C. W. I. PUGH.

The next business on the Private Calender was a bill (H. R. 3419) granting a pension to C. W. I. Pugh.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of C. W. I. Pugh, late a private in Company G, Forty-fifth Kentucky Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

C. W. I. Pugh enlisted as a private in Company G, Twenty-fourth Kentucky Volunteers, on the 5th November, 1861, and, without procuring a discharge from said service, re-enlisted in Company G, Forty-fifth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, and continued in said service until he was discharged therefrom on the 14th February, 1865.

While in the service and in line of duty, in an engagement in battle with the enemy near Lexington, Ky., in June, 1864, he was thrown from his horse, and received a rupture in right groin, resulting in hernia, which has permanently disabled him.

He filed claim for pension February 15, 1881, and after having four special examinations his claim was rejected on the ground that he had no right to enlist in Forty-fifth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers without first procuring a discharge from first service.

It is abundantly shown that he was a good, brave, and faithful soldier, always ready for duty, and that he acted in perfect good faith when he enlisted in the said Forty-fifth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, and that he did not know his last enlistment was a violation of the rules and regulations of the Department of War.

In view of the faithful service of the soldier during his first service and the perfect good faith with which he enlisted in the last regiment, and the long and faithful service during his last service, and the fact that the proof in the case shows beyond doubt that he was sound and free from any hernia or other disability when he enlisted, and that he was, while in line of duty and in battle with the enemy, permanently disabled, and the further fact that after an exhaustive examination of his case by a special examiner of the Pension Office the facts in the case appear so overwhelmingly meritorious that the special examiner recommends the granting of a pension, notwithstanding the decision of the Adjutant-General touching the soldier's right to enlist in his last service, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL V. BALLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 846) granting a pension to Samuel V. Balland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place the name of Samuel V. Balland, late of Company C, Fifty-second Kentucky Regiment of Mounted Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Samuel V. Holland enlisted as a private in Company C, Fifty-second Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, August 23, 1863, and was discharged therefrom January 17, 1865. He applied for pension January 5, 1880, based on disease of lungs resulting from cold contracted while in said service, and in the line of duty, and while he was a prisoner of war.

His claim was rejected on February 8, 1884, on the ground of no record and the claimant's declared inability to furnish medical testimony showing treatment during service or prior to 1867.

Claimant testifies that he was sound and able-bodied and free from disease when he enlisted, and that while he was in the service and in the line of duty at Franklin, Ky., and while he was a prisoner of war near Mount Sterling, Ky., he was subjected to great exposure and hardships, was forced by General John H. Morgan's command to travel a great distance on foot on "double-quick" time, and forced to wade streams of water, from which he contracted severe cold, which resulted in a severe cough and disease of the lungs, from which he has never recovered, and which has disabled him from earning a support by manual labor. He further testifies that Dr. Hawthorne, the only surgeon who treated him in the service, is dead, and that Dr. Farmville, the only physician who treated him from discharge to 1867, is also dead.

Fifteen witnesses testify in the case, nearly all of whom are certified in the "brief" to be of good character and credibility.

Your committee are of opinion that these witnesses, many of whom were his intimate acquaintances before the war, and seven of whom were his comrades in the service, and three of whom were taken prisoners with claimant, clearly and beyond the shadow of a reasonable doubt establish each and every material fact to which claimant testifies.

Your committee are of opinion that claimant is entitled to a pension. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with the orthography of the soldier's name as printed in the bill corrected so as to be spelled "Samuel V. Holland."

The committee reported an amendment, as follows:

Strike out "Balland," in the fourth line, and insert in lieu thereof the word

"Holland;" also amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Samuel V. Holland."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LUCY J. MITCHELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 858) granting a pension to Lucy J. Mitchell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws governing pensions to widows of captains, the name of Lucy J. Mitchell, widow of Joseph Mitchell, deceased, late captain of Company I, Forty-eighth Regiment Kentucky Mounted Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Joseph Mitchell, the husband of Lucy J. Mitchell, enlisted in Company I, Forty-eighth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers, and was duly commissioned as captain of said company on the 5th day of October, 1863, and served as captain of said company until November 12, 1863, when he died from brain fever and inflammation of brain, which he contracted while in said service and in the line of duty.

Lucy J. Mitchell, his widow, applied for pension on the 29th day of July, 1867, which was rejected on the 13th day of September, 1875, on the ground that soldier was not in the service of the United States at the time he contracted the disease from which he died, as shown by the Adjutant-General.

The report of the Adjutant-General shows the facts, as set out in the second paragraph of this report, to exist so far as relates to enlistment, commission, service, and death of the soldier, but decides that the soldier was not mustered, from the fact that, under General Order No. 61, of 1861, from the War Department, "no person could be mustered into service as captain prior to the completion of company by its being mustered into the service, and the records show that said company was not mustered into the service until after the death of the captain, as aforesaid."

The fact is well established, however, that said captain was actually and in good faith in the service of the United States, and on actual and bona fide duty as captain, from the date of his said commission until the date of his death, and that his death was incident to and caused by his said service.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments, to wit: Insert after the word "late" and before the word "of," in the seventh line, the word "captain"; also, add after the word "laws" and before the word "the," in the fifth line, the words "governing pensions to widows of captains."

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. LIZZIE E. COONEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3402) granting a pension to Mrs. Lizzie E. Cooney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lizzie E. Cooney, widow of George W. Cooney, late of Company C, Twenty-second Regiment Iowa Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that Lizzie E. Cooney is the widow of George W. Cooney, who enlisted August 2, 1862, in the Twenty-second Regiment of Iowa Volunteers, and was discharged July 25, 1865. January 2, 1878, he fell dead while walking in the street.

The widow made application for pension April 29, 1880, which the Pension Department declines to allow because there is no record evidence of injuries or of medical treatment in service or since, and the widow declares her inability to furnish it, and in her affidavit says that he persistently refused to employ a physician, giving as a reason that he had no faith in them and no money to pay them for their services.

The lay evidence seems strong and conclusive. Persons who knew him before he enlisted state that he was a strong, hearty man, who never employed a physician.

J. R. Rodgers testifies:

"That while in service and the line of duty claimant contracted sciatic rheumatism by exposure incident to the service, also hemorrhage of the lungs and affection of the heart, which was contracted during the siege of Vicksburg, in May or June, 1863, and in the battle of Winchester, in Virginia, in September, 1864; that he knows the foregoing facts from personal knowledge, having been in the same regiment with claimant. After the close of the war he came to my house and made it his home for two or three months. He was then suffering from rheumatism and camp diarrhea. I know by being associated with him every day, he not being able to do anything, and was confined to his bed part of the time."

Dr. Henry E. Hunter testifies:

"I knew George W. Cooney in his lifetime, and was well acquainted with him at the time he entered the military service of the United States, and I was acquainted with him at the time of his discharge from said service, at least after his arrival home; that at the time he entered the service he was, as I believe, a sound and healthy man. After his arrival home, after his discharge, I knew him to be suffering from a chronic form of rheumatism, at times muscular, at other times taking the form of rheumatoid arthritis, so much so as to incapacitate him from performing manual labor at all. He also suffered from a chronic diarrhea every once in a while during the time above mentioned and until he left this county for Kansas."

Joseph and Emma Rodgers testify to an intimate acquaintance before and after the service; that when he enlisted he was an apparently well, robust man, and when he returned from the Army he was suffering from rheumatism and was emaciated.

Cora A Graves testifies—

"That she lived near him and boarded in the same family with said George W. Cooney six months, from August, 1867, to latter part of January, 1868, and boarded in the family of George W. Cooney at various times and for different lengths of time up to within two years of his death; that ever since about August, 1867, this affiant had known deceased as a neighbor, and when not boarding in the family had resided in the same city with him, and about half a mile distant from him; saw him at least once per week during the whole time. He took dinner with me on Sunday about two weeks prior to his death. Ever since affiant first knew said Cooney he was almost a constant sufferer from rheumatism and heart disease; was disabled from manual labor more than half the time. He was never able to do a day's work of hard labor. At times he suffered very intense pain. On Thanksgiving Day before his death he was compelled to leave the table, being taken with severe pain in the chest, which seemed to go to his heart. These attacks became more frequent and severe until within three days of his death, when he became pale. During these attacks he had difficulty in breathing, and he required rubbing to bring him to. Since I first knew him he has complained of pain in his left lung and heart."

It seems conclusively proven that he served nearly three years in some of the most severe and trying campaigns of the war; that he had rheumatism and heart disease in the Army at the time of discharge, and that it continued until his death, which, it seems reasonable to suppose, could have been from no other cause than heart disease. Owing to his peculiar notions, no physician was employed after discharge, and no medical evidence can be furnished.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. HANNAH M. CHAPMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3539) granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah M. Chapman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Hannah M. Chapman, widow of Charles Chapman, late a private in Company K, Sixth Minnesota Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that claimant is the widow of Charles Chapman, who enlisted in Company K, Sixth Minnesota Volunteers, August 14, 1862, and was discharged August 19, 1865. He died February 22, 1881.

The widow's application for pension was rejected on the ground that "the lung disease and diarrhea in service not established." She is unable to show any hospital record, because, as the Surgeon-General certifies, "No hospital records of the Sixth Minnesota Volunteers were ever on file in this office." But she does prove by his officers and comrades that the disease was contracted in the service; that he was treated in the hospital; that it continued until his death and was the cause of it. Henry S. Barrett, first lieutenant of Company K, Sixth Minnesota Volunteers, whose reputation is vouched for as the very best, testifies—

That he remembers well that during soldier's term of service he became lame and injured in the shoulder, so that he could not carry his knapsack at times, and it was transported in the company wagon; that he was so injured he could not get his arm in his coat-sleeve, and it had to be cut open; that soldier was also sick and afflicted with rheumatism at Helena, Ark., in the summer of 1864. During the latter part of June and most of July and 1st of August, 1865, the weather was very hot; that the company was at Montgomery, Ala.; that several negroes were to be hanged, and soldier was one of a guard at the hanging. The day was very hot, and when the guard returned affiant was informed that soldier had been sun-struck; that he was sick and feeble for some time after his return to camp."

Capt. W. W. Braden, of Company K, whose standing is also high, says, in addition to what Lieutenant Barrett testifies to:

"That in the autumn of 1864, at Helena, Ark., soldier was very sick with pneumonia or some lung trouble, brought on by a severe cold, caused by exposure camping on the ground, which was cold and damp from frequent rains, and from the fact that the regiment was stationed on the Mississippi River bottoms; that during all the summer of 1864 soldier complained of the heat of the sun; that shortly after being taken sick at Helena, Ark., soldier was sent to a hospital at Helena and put under medical treatment; that he has seen soldier at frequent intervals since, and to all appearances he has not been well since, and was partially incapacitated for manual labor till his death in February, 1881."

Charles E. Masey, a comrade, corroborates the above, and says that soldier was in hospital at Helena, under care of Surgeon McMasters, and that he has had a bad cough ever since his discharge until his death.

Job Brown says he knew this soldier intimately from 1852 until his death; that when he enlisted he was a strong, hearty man, and that after his discharge he was never a well man, but was almost constantly troubled with coughing and frequently complained of trouble with his chest and lungs. Celia Breese corroborates the above.

Dr. J. B. Fairbanks testifies that he treated this soldier in January and February, 1881, for inflammation of the lungs, and from his appearance judged it had been of long standing; that he did not see him for ten days before he died, as he lived fifteen miles away, but he is of the opinion that the chief cause of his death was lung trouble. A large number of reputable witnesses corroborate the above.

Had the surgeons of the regiment kept and filed with the Surgeon-General a record of the cases treated this case would doubtless have been allowed. Their failure to do their duty has so far deprived this poor widow of her pension. Ought the Government to take advantage of the neglect of its own agents to perform their duty?

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PATSEY JACKSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 5191) to increase the pension of Patsey Jackson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Patsey Jackson, widow of James S. Jackson, late a brigadier-general in the volunteer forces of the United States, to $50 per month.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report in that case read.

The report by (Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that Patsey Jackson is the widow of the late Brig. Gen. James S. Jackson, of the United States volunteer forces; that he was killed at the battle of Perryville, Ky., October 8, 1862; that she has received a pension at the rate of $30 per month since the date of his death. This bill asks that she be paid a pension of $50 per month.

As Congress has repeatedly increased the pensions of widows of general officers to this amount, your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for bill 1426.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARIA MIBORD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 3524) granting a pension to Mara Mibord.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Maria Mibord, widow of Isadore Mibord, deceased, late a private in Company H, Tenth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that Maria Mibord is the widow of Isadore Mibord, late of Company H, Tenth Missouri Cavalry. This soldier received a terrible wound at an engagement with the enemy near Monticello, Ala., March 31, 1865. The ball entered the right side of the head just behind the ear and passed through his right eye, destroying the sight of the eye and the hearing of the ear. For this he was allowed $4 per month. He died November 29, 1878, and his widow made an application for a pension, alleging the gunshot wound as the cause of his death. The application was rejected on the ground that his death was caused by pneumonia and had no connection with the gunshot wound. A large amount of evidence was taken by a special examiner, which shows that the man was in a frightful condition.

James Sack testifies that it was easy for any one who was acquainted with him to tell the cause of his death; was with him when he died, and dressed him after death. During his last illness he complained of misery in his head. All the time after his discharge he was badly affected in his head—would have spells, that he would fall down and become senseless, and corrupt matter was running from his eye and nose about all the time. There was no doctor present the night he died. Some other neighbors who were present in his last sickness testify to substantially the same facts. Dr. Thomas J. Mahon testifies "that claimant often came to him to buy drugs; that he was not able to employ a physician; that it is his opinion that he died from the effect of the gunshot wound; that he told him a short time before that he had not long to live. His eye was mattering and running, and was a frightful thing to look at; gradually grew weaker year by year and month by month.

Dr. D. A. Waters was called once to see him two days before he died, and decided that he was suffering from pneumonia; never saw him before or after. His death may have been hastened by pneumonia, but it seems from the evidence that it must have followed in a few weeks from the wound in the absence of other causes.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY H. GREEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 2939) granting a pension to Henry H. Green.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the rules and regulations of the Pension Office, the name of Henry H. Green, late a private in Company E, Forty-fifth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that Henry H. Green was a member of Company E, Forty-fifth Regiment Missouri Enrolled Militia; that said regiment was called into the service of the United States under General Order No. 19, of General Schofield. August 23, 1871, he made application for a pension, alleging disability from injury to hips; that while on a forced march from Macon City to Glasgow, Mo., about October 28, 1864, his horse stumbled and fell on him, seriously wounding and injuring both hips.

Capt. G. W. R. Ledford, who commanded the company, testifies, June 1, 1872:

"That Henry H. Green was a private in said company; that while in the line of his duty when said company was in actual service of the United States, on forced march from Macon City, Mo., to Glasgow, Mo., during the 'Price raid' in Missouri, when a few miles of Roanoke, Mo., and on or about the 1st day of November, 1864, the said company being mounted on horses and under fast speed, being a fast trot or gallop, the horse upon which said Green was mounted blundered and stumbled and fell, turning or falling over his head and on his back and falling upon said Green, severely crushing and bruising him, so that he was for several days entirely helpless, and he was conveyed in a wagon to Roanoke, where he was left in charge of a citizen physician, whose name I do not know. I know these facts from being at the time present with and in command of said company, and seeing said Green immediately after he fell, and directed how he should be conveyed; and although I did not see the horse fall, being a short distance away, yet from what I saw, and what was said at the time, and all the circumstances, I am satisfied his injury occurred as I have stated.

"I was well acquainted with said Green at the time and some time before his enlistment, say about three or four years, and up to the time of his said injury he was a stout, healthy man. I have known him ever since his injury, and know that he has been unable to perform ordinary manual labor; his injury seems to be in his hips. That no certificates of discharge were issued to members of said Enrolled Missouri Militia Service; they were enrolled and organized under the orders of the governor of Missouri and the commander of the Department of the Missouri, and when their services were required they were placed in actual service by orders from the district or department commanders of the United States forces, and when their services were not longer needed they were relieved from actual service by the same authority. The said company and regiment were relieved from duty by General Fisk in about fourteen days after said Green was injured."

Dr. W. Williams testifies, in 1877:

"I am a citizen of Putnam County, Missouri; I am thirty-seven years of age; I am a regular practicing physician, and have been engaged in the practice of medicine for the last fifteen years; I am personally and well acquainted with Henry H. Green, the claimant, and have been so acquainted with him for the last fifteen years, and have been his family physician during the period of ten years. I know of my personal knowledge that he was a man of good, sound, physical health, free from all injuries of the hips and loins, prior to the time he enlisted in the Enrolled Missouri Militia in the year 1862, and that he is now badly injured in the hips and loins, caused by a mash, and has been so injured to my personal knowledge ever since he was discharged from said service in December, 1864."

Dr. W. C. Harvey, of Roanoke, Mo., testifies:

"I am personally acquainted with Henry H. Green, late a private in Company E, Forty-fifth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, war of 1861-'65. On or about October 23, 1864, while said regiment was marching from Macon City, Mo., to Glasgow, Howard County, Missouri, to meet the confederate forces then invading the State, the said Henry H. Green, near the said town of Roanoke, was thrown from his horse and had his hips and loins mashed severely. He was left by said regiment at the residence of Robert Cornelius, now deceased, at the said town of Roanoke, under my treatment. I rendered him medical treatment for said injury for about ten days, when he was removed to Macon City, Macon County, Missouri."

This case was rejected by the Department on the ground that the regiment to which he belonged was a State organization. As the disability seems clearly proven, and Congress has invariably allowed cases of a similar character, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELMIRA M. DORMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5192) granting a pension to Elmira M. Dorman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Elmira M. Dorman, minor child of James Dorman, late of Company A, First Regiment Kansas Volunteers, and to pay to her legally constituted guardian, for the sole use and benefit of said minor, the sum of $10 per month until she arrives at the age of sixteen years, said pension to be paid to her legally constituted guardian for her sole use and benefit.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that James Dorman, the former husband of claimant, enlisted in Company A, First Kansas Volunteers, in May, 1861, and was discharged in June, 1864. At the battle of Wilson Creek, Missouri, August 10, 1861, he received a severe rupture, which entirely disabled him for active service, and during the remainder of his term of service he was employed as an ambulance driver. For this disability he received the usual pension for like disability until the time of his death, in Washington, D. C., in 1879. The widow applied for a pension, which was rejected on the ground that the immediate cause of his death was not due to the disability received in the Army. The health officer of the District gave a certificate of death from heart disease. He says in a subsequent affidavit that he had treated him during the year prior to his death for heart disease, and that "it was, in his judgment, induced by indigestion and constipation in consequence of inguinal hernia."

It appears from the evidence that the family was very poor, and that no physician was in attendance at the time of his death. Persons who were present testify that, and those who were with him for several hours previous say he complained of no pain except the hernia, from which he suffered intensely, and that the only relief he could get was by sitting in a bent position with his left limb pressed hard against the swollen part.

Dr. D. W. Bliss certifies:

"I fully examined into the character of disability, and, as far as possible, the cause of death of James Dorman, late of Company A, First Kansas Volunteers, and am of the opinion that the immediate cause of his death was strangulated hernia, which was not recognized by he physician in attendance."

Dr. J. E. Dexter says:

"I have spent much time in trying to ascertain, if possible, the real cause of the death of James Dorman, late of Company A, First Kansas Volunteers, and from information secured from those present at his death, and who attended him during his sickness, I am fully satisfied he died from strangulated hernia. His employment at the time of his death, and for some time previous, that of a street-car driver, had a direct tendency to aggravate the disease from which he was suffering, and for which he received a pension. The real history of his sickness gives not the least indication that he had ever previously or was at the time suffering from heart disease. Beyond a reasonable doubt his hernia was the cause of his death."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEVI KOONTZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5193) granting a pension to Levi Koontz.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Levi Koontz, dependent father of Alfred Koontz, deceased, formerly of Company D, Thirty-ninth Regiment of Iowa Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that Levi Koontz is the father of Alfred Koontz, deceased, formerly of Company D, Thirty-ninth Iowa Volunteers; that the soldier in 1877 made application for a pension for hernia, which was allowed in 1878, the record evidence proving that he incurred the disability in the service. January 5, 1879, the soldier died. In 1883 his mother made application for a pension, but died before making the necessary proof. In 1884 claimant applied for a pension as dependent father. The physician who attended the soldier in his last sickness died before the mother made her application, and his evidence as to cause of death could not be obtained. His neighbors testify that the hernia was the cause of his death, and one of them, in his affidavit, says the physician told him (the affiant) that the soldier's death was caused by the hernia. During the war and up to his death he had contributed freely to the support of his mother and father. The father is now old and poor and unable to earn a living.

The bill asks that the arrears of pension which would have been paid the son had he lived be now paid to the father. This would be establishing a precedent entirely unwarranted by any existing law, or by any sound principle of equity. The son died before the arrears-of-pension act passed, and consequently could have acquired no rights under it. The evidence of the soldier's devotion to his parents and his willingness to contribute to their support is so strong that your committee feel that the father should be placed on the pension-roll as a dependent parent.

They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for bill H. R. 1393.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANDREW J. FULLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1351) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Andrew J. Fuller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Andrew J. Fuller, late a member of Company I, First Missouri State Militia.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that the soldier enlisted February 26, 1862, and was discharged November 17, 1864; that he made application for pension September 6, 1869, for gunshot wound of left leg, which was allowed July 23, 1870; that his name was subsequently stricken from the roll on the ground that his wound was not received in the line of duty.

The evidence in the case shows, as appears from the affidavit of Capt. Milton Burris, captain of Company I, First Missouri State Militia Cavalry—

"That said Andrew J. Fuller was accidentally wounded through the ankle and foot about the 8th day of November, 1863; that his wound was received in about the following manner: That said Fuller stated that he had gone out to Blackwater, a creek some two or three miles from camp, to water his horse, and that while riding his horse his gun was accidentally discharged by striking against his saddle, and he was wounded; that it was a custom of the men to go out to said Blackwater Creek to water their horses; that said Fuller was brought into the hospital after receiving his wound before affiant saw him."

Affiant further states that as said Fuller was not strictly "in the line of duty" at the time, he had some hesitancy in so stating, but under the act of Congress construing the term "in the line of his duty," that he was not absent without leave nor engaged in any unlawful pursuit.

Affiant further states that said Fuller was an excellent soldier and obedient to orders, and was always ready for duty and performed any duty required of him however hazardous, and was noted throughout the regiment for his bravery in scouts and in encounters with bushwhackers. On one occasion said Fuller alone whipped three bushwhackers, killing one, wounding another, and running the other off. The bushwhackers were well armed and in a house at the commencement of the fight. On another occasion said Fuller, while hunting for bushwhackers, came across a bushwhacker in a fence-corner and Fuller took a hand-to-hand fight with him, and both fired some five or six times, when they clinched and Fuller killed the bushwhacker with the breech of his pistol. Affiant witnessed the last encounter. For his bravery and for his severe wound affiant states that he believes said Fuller should receive a pension.

A special examiner reports that Fuller told him that on the morning he was shot he had a swelling under his arm and reported it to the surgeon, who said he would report him "sick in quarters." That Fuller then took his rifle and went off horseback for a ride. That after riding some time he shot a squirrel, and shortly after this his gun went off and he was shot. Didn't know what made it. He at once reported to the hospital. That he had set some traps for catching mink and was on the way to see them, but did not reach them because of the accident. Subsequently Fuller states that he was at the house sick when the special examiner called, and that he did not read the statement that was written out for him to sign, and that it contains statements that are not true and that were never made by him.

On application for restoration to the roll the soldier filed the affidavit of his colonel, James McFerran, bearing date of October 24, 1880, in which Colonel McFerran says:

"The company and regiment were engaged in guerrilla warfare on the Missouri and Kansas border during the most of the three years they were in the service—no quarters given or asked in such warfare. The guerrillas traversed the country in small squads, concentrating when a point could be found weak enough to attack successfully. The war was emphatically one of surprises and alarms, and reliable information was at all times invaluable. Fuller was among soldiers the bravest of the brave, loyal, intelligent, active, and at all times ready and reliable for any service, no difference how arduous or hazardous, and was therefore invaluable as a scout. His company officials gave him special privileges, and allowed him to control his own actions, knowing he was always subserving the best interests of his country by obtaining and reporting information obtained through great effort and peril mainly on his own hook.

"Seventeen years have passed since then, but I still remember the daring exploits and valuable services of the young soldier. My best impression is that he could not be properly charged at any time with being without the line of his duty. Captain Burris, who supported his application, was a brave and honorable officer, and among the best guerrilla fighters in the regiment. He is dead—his battles are over. Fuller, a cripple, after the most faithful and efficient service, is a mendicant, unable to earn his daily bread. He seems to have no friends left but his faithful lieutenant. I make this statement as a tribute to his merits, and hope the department may see its way clear to restore this soldier to his pension. A more deserving soldier I have never seen and it is but just for the Government, always considerate of the soldier, to let him have the pension granted on the testimony of those who knew the value of his services."

The report of the special examiner, before referred to, states that Fuller is a reliable and truthful man, as shown by the depositions of R. E. Durham, deputy postmaster, W. H. Hillman, and D. T. Johnson, druggists, all of Bethany, Harrison County, Missouri, who testify that they have been intimately acquainted with him for years.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANK LIGHTNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4118) granting a pension to Frank Lightner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frank Lightner, late of Company C, Sixty-fifth Regiment United States Colored Troops.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that claimant enlisted December 13, 1863, in Company C, Sixty-fifth Regiment United States Colored Troops, and was discharged January 8, 1867. In September, 1863, he filed an application for a pension, alleging wound in the head and scald on left arm about May, 1866, by the explosion of the boiler on the steamer City of Memphis. The application was rejected on the ground that he was on a furlough at the time of the accident, and therefore not in line of duty.

The evidence in the case shows that claimant, with sixteen other United States soldiers, was on the City of Memphis when the explosion took place; that ten of the number were killed, and claimant badly wounded, his skull being fractured and his arms badly scalded.

Claimant states that he was granted a furlough upon condition that he would re-enlist in the Ninth United States Cavalry; that after the accident he was on the sick-list for nine months, and upon his return to his regiment he was rejected for re-enlistment on account of the disability incurred by the accident.

The examining surgeon at Denver reports, December 19, 1883: "Wound transversely across posterior end of suture, about 3 inches long and an inch wide. I should think that both tables had been removed." Rated one-fourth.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES A. UNDERWOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 805) to increase the pension of James A. Underwood.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the pension of James A. Underwood, late of Company B, Eighth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, to $30 per month.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report in that case read.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

We find that claimant enlisted August 20, 1861, in Company B, Eighth Indiana Volunteers, and was discharged September 14, 1863.

February, 1864, he applied for a pension for loss of left arm at battle of Vicksburg, which was granted, and for which he is now receiving a pension of $24 per month.

May 22, 1885, he applied for an increase on account of chronic diarrhea and erysipelas, which was rejected on the ground that the combined disabilities were not equal to total inability to perform manual labor. Two of his neighbors swear that he is unable to perform any manual labor whatever. December 4, 1876, Dr. W. W. Spiers, United States medical examiner, says:

"I find that left forearm has been amputated at upper third, considerable sloughing has occurred from gangrene, leaving a stump with very tender cicatrix. Claimant states that two years ago an eruption broke out on his left arm and spread all over his body; continued nine weeks; was confined to his bed four weeks; muscles of leg were contracted; went on crutches for a while. Last August eruption came out on biceps muscles of left arm, lasted two weeks; comes out in warm weather. I find no eruption now. I think it is not erysipelas, but a vesicular eruption resulting from chronic diarrhea. His gums are badly eaten by scurvy. There is not much emaciation, but his weight is some less than it ought to be. Rated total third grade for loss of arm and $4 for diarrhea."

June 24, 1885, the examining board at Ellsworth, Kans., report him suffering with chronic diarrhea, and recommended $4 per month in addition to his pension for loss of arm. The evidence shows that he is at times confined to his bed for weeks with chronic diarrhea and the resulting eruptions, which he calls erysipelas. The man is a complete wreck, and it would seem that the evidence would entitle him to the full rating given to those totally disabled for the performance of manual labor. The examining boards recommend $38 per month. There is no such rating provided by law. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE H. PERKINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 1369) granting a pension to George H. Perkins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of George H. Perkins, late a private in Company I, Third Regiment Massachusetts Heavy Artillery Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The record in this case shows that Perkins enlisted as a private in Company I, Third Massachusetts Heavy Artillery, on December 26, 1863, and was discharged on September 26, 1865; that he filed his application for a pension on January 19, 1880, alleging that at Broadway Landing, on the Appomattox River, about 3 miles above City Point, Va., about January 10, 1865, he, with his company, was attending to the ponton bridge across the river at that place, where he was taken sick with chills and fever and chronic diarrhea, and was treated by some surgeon belonging to a regiment near, but principally by Lieutenant Chamberlain, of his regiment; that as soon as well enough he got a furlough to go home; he returned to his company in March, 1865, and in August, 1865, was taken worse with the chills and diarrhea; and when the regiment arrived at Galloup's Island, Boston Harbor, he took a severe cold, which settled on his lungs about September 22, 1865.

His application was rejected July 18, 1882, "upon the ground of there being no record of alleged diseases, and claimant's inability to furnish the testimony of the surgeon or assistant surgeon of his regiment showing treatment in the service, or medical evidence showing treatment at discharge or for some time thereafter, and then the medical testimony not satisfactory."

It is in evidence, as shown by the testimony of Perkins, that he resided in Springfield, Mass., prior to enlisment, and from discharge to November, 1866; from then to April, 1877, at Jefferson City, Mo., and since then at Kansas City, Mo.

Oliver Allen testifies that he knew Perkins for thirty years before his enlistment, also during the term of his service, having been a member of same company, and since discharge; that at the time of Perkins's enlistment Perkins was employed in the United States armory at Springfield, Mass.; he was then a sound, healthy, able-bodied man, especially free from chills and fever; that during his term of service Perkins contracted chills and fever in consequence of exposure, and was several times under care of surgeons. Having no surgeons of this organization, he was treated by those of other organizations, whose names witness does not recall. Witness was with him when discharged, and he was suffering intensely with chills and fever; was weak, emaciated, and completely broken down. Saw him frequently until November, 1866, when Perkins went West, and up to that time he had only been able to work one week at light joiner-work. Witness saw him next in November, 1876, in Springfield; he was then very feeble and suffering from a severe attack of said disease; saw him from time to time until following April, and during all that time he was taking medicine and was totally unable to perform any manual labor.

This witness is corroborated, except as to incurrence of disability in the service, by Asa M. Piper. Christopher Briggs, of Springfield, who had charge of the pattern department of the armory when claimant was employed there, says that Perkins was a sound, healthy, able-bodied man, and free from disease of any sort up to the time of his enlistment.

Lieutenant Chamberlain testifies that Perkins was taken sick with diarrhea in October, 1864, and continued so for several weeks, unfit for duty, and again in January, 1865, he was taken sick with chills and fever and chronic diarrhea and confined to his quarters. Witness visited him daily and took a surgeon of a regiment lying near the battery to see him. About the latter part of July Perkins had another attack of diarrhea, and about August 15, 1865, was taken down with chills and fever and was very sick. Witness gave him medicine, as they had no surgeon, and had to depend upon surgeons of some regiment that happened to be near.

Capt. John Pickering, captain of claimant's company, testifies "that the said George H. Perkins, while in the line of his duty at or near Richmond, in the State of Virginia, did, on or about the 6th day of September, 1865, become disabled in the following manner, viz: Was taken with diarrhea and continued sick until the 16th instant, inclusive;" that he makes the statement from a record in his possession kept daily by his company clerk. This statement shows his condition within ten days of his discharge.

This testimony of Lieutenant Chamberlain and Comrade Allen, that this lat-tery was compelled to rely for surgical aid upon any surgeon who happened to be in their vicinity, seems to explain the "want of record of alleged diseases, and claimant's inability to furnish the testimony of the surgeon or assistant surgeon of his regiment," which is assigned as one of the reasons for rejecting the case.

Upon the point raised by the Pension Office, that there is no "medical evidence showing treatment at discharge, or for some time thereafter," claimant, in an affidavit filed June 2, 1884, says:

"This evidence I can not obtain, because the surgeons who doctored me during the first fourteen or fifteen months after being mustered out are both dead. Therefore I make the following statement under oath:

"On arriving home at Springfield, Mass., after being mustered out of the service September 26, 1865, I was first doctored by my family physician, H. G. Stickney, M. D., and by him until June 29, 1866, at which date I consulted with Dr. David P. Smith, of Springfield, Mass., who doctored me up to December, 1866, when, by his advice, and that of Dr. Peabody, of Jefferson City, Mo., I came to Missouri. Dr. Smith told me I would have to seek a warmer climate or I would not live.

"On August 7, 1866, I made application for a pension through Capt. L. A. Tiff, pension agent, of Springfield, Mass., and on August 8 following I obtained the affidavit of Dr. Stickney of my condition and treatment by him, paying $1 for the affidavit, as shown by my diary kept at that time. I suppose it was forwarded to the Pension Department at Washington. Captain Tiff died soon after my application was made, but I have had his papers carefully examined by those having charge of them, and the affidavit can not be found if not on file at Washington. * * *

"In 1880 I wrote to Dr. Smith for an affidavit, and he replied that he would be glad to give one, but being examining surgeon for the United States at Springfield, Mass., he did not feel like making one until called on by the Government, when he would be glad to give it. This was before the department called on me to produce his affidavit. * * * From this it will be seen that it is impossible for me to produce any other medical evidence of treatment for the fourteen or fifteen months just following my discharge from the service at the close of the war."

This period, however, is well covered by other testimony, and from December 1, 1866, to April 9, 1882, the date of his last examination by the board of pension surgeons, at Leavenworth, Kans., his condition is well established by the testimony of physicians and neighbors, and may be stated in the language of Dr. George T. Hayden, who treated him in Kansas City, Mo., from 1872 to 1881:

"During the greater portions of the above-mentioned years he has been unable to perform manual labor. His disease appears to assume at times a tendency to consumption of the bowels. Having inherited a good constitution, and being a strictly moral and temperate man, he has been able during portions of that time to perform light labor, but is obliged to work for less wages; that at no time is he able to do a man's work, and my opinion is that his disease is liable at any time to terminate in consumption of the bowels, as at times he has had a severe cough, spitting of blood, and considerable lung trouble, while at all times the bowel trouble predominates."

Your committee, believing that claimant has clearly proven that his disability originated in the service and has continued ever since, recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM B. JACOBS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4199) granting a pension to William B. Jacobs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William B. Jacobs, late a member of the Fifty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

William B. Jacobs enlisted as a private on the 26th day of October, A. D. 1862, as a recruit for the Fifty-ninth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry, commanded by Col. James P. Fyffe, in the service of the United States in the war of the rebellion. That he was recruited by Lieut. George P. Tyler, at Russellville, Ohio, by whom he was duly sworn into the service of the United States as a private soldier. He was taken with the company of which he was a member to Camp Dennison, in Hamilton County, Ohio, where he continued in the service of the United States as a private soldier until about the 25th day of December, A. D. 1862, but was never regularly mustered into the service; during the time he was so in the service, and in the line of his duty as such soldier, the evidence abundantly shows he contracted a severe cold by reason of exposure which he could not avoid, and which resulted in an inflammation of his right eye, which became so aggravated as to cause his other eye by sympathy to become inflamed and weak to such an extent that it became necessary to have the ball of his right eye removed, to which operation he submitted under the advice of eminent physicians.

Dr. J. N. Salisbury, a reputable physician, and of good standing in his profession, states that he was the family physician of the said William B. Jacobs, and on the examination of his books he finds no treatment for the eye of the said William B. Jacobs prior to his enlistment, but later, some time before 1864, he did prescribe for his eye, a year or two before he went blind. He says the eye was entirely gone in 1864 or 1865.

S. M. Mellheny swears that he knew William B. Jacobs for many years before he went into the service, and two years before he enlisted he lived within one-fourth of a mile of the said Jacobs, and during that time he never knew of his having anything the matter with his eyes, nor of any other bodily infirmity.

Lieut. George P. Tyler, in his affidavit, states that on the 26th day of October, A. D. 1862, he enlisted and swore into the service of the United States William B. Jacobs, and at the time he enlisted he believed him to be a sound man, he having known him for years previous to that time, and never knew of his being sick or complaining of any ailment. He further states that he took the recruits for the Fifty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry to camp, and embarked at Ripley, Ohio, on a steamboat for Cincinnati, Ohio, and the steamer was so crowded with troops that his recruits (among whom was the said William B. Jacobs) were put on the hurricane deck and remained there during the entire trip to Cincinnati. It rained on them the whole night. They had no blankets, and before morning the rain turned to sleet. Arriving at Camp Dennison they had no wood to build fires, and had to repair their quarters before they could occupy them, and from this exposure Lieut. George P. Tyler says that William B. Jacobs took cold, and it settled in his right eye, causing inflammation of the same, and it grew worse, so that when he had the recruits examined by United States surgeon at Camp Dennison to be mustered into the United States service William B. Jacobs was rejected on account of the inflammation of his right eye, since which time the said William B. Jacobs has had his right eye removed from its socket.

Claimant says post surgeon gave him a certificate of disability and he returned home, which certificate of disability was delivered by claimant to his attorney for the purpose of procuring his pay from the State of Ohio while he was in the service of the United States, and is now lost, as he is informed by his said attorney. Claimant further says that up to the time of his enlistment his eyes were in a sound and healthy condition, and ever since he contracted the cold and disability aforesaid he has suffered greatly in consequence of the diseased condition of his eye, and he has become greatly enfeebled and disabled in bodily health to such an extent that he has not been able to perform manual labor or to pursue his occupation as a farmer. He is now in his forty-fourth year, he has never received any compensation for his services from any source whatever, and he is advised that he is not entitled to any relief under existing laws relating to pensions.

The evidence clearly establishes the fact that he was a healthy man when he was enlisted and sworn into the United service, and that he is now disabled, and his disability was incurred while in the service of his country, and has continued down to the present time, disabling him from the performance of manual labor.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES M'MULLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1858) granting an increase of pension to James McMullin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James McMullin, late of Company I, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and the Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

In the matter of House bill No. 1858, of James McMullen, we find he enlisted in 1862 in Company I, One hundred and eighteenth New York Infantry, and was honorably discharged therefrom June 30, 1865; re-enlisted April, 1866, in Sixth United States Cavalry; honorably discharged April 2, 1869; re-enlisted April 5, 1869, in same company and regiment, and honorably discharged May 2, 1872, for total disability; that while a member of the One hundred and eighteenth New York he took part in ten general engagements, and while in line of duty at Fort Harrison, Va., September 29, 1864, was wounded in left arm by gunshot (ball never removed); that while in the Sixth United States Cavalry, and in line of duty, in an engagement with the Indians near Fort Richardson, Tex., March 7, 1868, he was wounded in right side, ball passing out near spinal column.

That while in same company and regiment, at Pilot Grove, Tex., February 22, 1869, he was thrown from a wagon and had his leg broken and ankle dislocated while he was acting in line of duty; that while in same company and regiment, on December 26, 1871, he had his feet and hands frozen, necessitating amputation of all his fingers and toes. He obtained at this time and occasion permission of the ranking sergeant of the company to go to Junction City, Kans., and on his return, within time of leave, was overtaken by a severe snow-storm, and the severity of the storm and injuries so by him received, as above set out, impeded his progress in traveling, and he became so sore from wounded leg and ankle and wounded side that he became exhausted, lost his course in the storm, and had his feet and hands frozen before reaching his company; that he had no witness to prove these facts, and the records of the company never showed his leave of absence, and he filed application for pension May 1, 1879, and the same was rejected August 11, 1880, for loss of feet and hands, because injury to feet and hands was not received in line of duty; that he is receiving a pension of $2 per month on pension certificate No. 225933 for gunshot wound of right side, as above set out; that he is receiving a pension of $3 per month for injuries and gunshot wound of arm; also $2 for broken leg and dislocated ankle. His record in War Department is good and clear of any stain.

Believing that claimant is entitled to relief on account of frozen fingers and toes, we recommend the passage of accompanying bill, amended, however, by striking out the word "thirty," in line 8, and insert therein instead the word "twenty."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY HOFF.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1254) granting a pension to Mary Hoff.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Hoff, the widow of Squire H. Hoff, late a private in Company F, Second Regiment of Minnesota Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1254) granting a pension to Mary Hoff, submit the following report:

There is no conflict in the evidence as to the disability of claimant's husband, who was a private in Company F, Second Minnesota Volunteers, and wounded at Kenesaw Mountain, June 16, 1864; and at the time of his death was receiving a pension of $18 per month. Claimant's application rejected on the ground that the cause of the soldier's death was not due to his military service, but the result of an injury received subsequent to his discharge from the Army.

C. H. Robbins, M. D., testifies that he attended soldier twelve years previous to his last illness, May 30, 1879, when he died. Soldier was a pensioner for gunshot wound in hip, in the immediate region of the sciatic nerve; extracted ball from hip about nine years ago. The wound was always painful; caused great nervous irritability before and after removal of ball. Several times before last sickness had strong symptoms of tetanus, the legitimate result of said wound. Any unusual excitement produced such symptoms. Before his last sickness he had a slight wound in his foot by a nail, which, with the predisposing cause of his wound, resulted in lockjaw, of which he died. Do not believe that the wound in the foot without the predisposing cause of gunshot wound would or could produce lockjaw.

Lafayette Redmon, M. D., testifies that he examined the soldier's wound one or more times while acting as examining surgeon; that the wound of hip was severe and extensive, implicating the great sciatic nerve and other important tissues; it rendered him peculiarly liable to be attacked with lockjaw.

Dr. R. W. Twitchell testifies to precisely the same state of facts.

Dr. C. H. Robbins swears that he unwittingly signed a former affidavit, which was prepared by another, contrary to what affiant had told him, and which he did not read at the time of signing, and caused great injustice to claimant; that soldier died by reason of gunshot wound of the right hip; that soldier carried an ounce minie-ball immediately over the sciatic nerve about eight or nine years; was then extracted, in 1871. After its removal he suffered almost continued pain and much nervous prostration and irritability of nervous system, and became considerably emaciated; that several times before his death he had strong symptoms of tetanus; the nervous irritability and prostration increased after each attack of sickness; the muscles of hip and thigh had grown fast to the bone in the immediate region of the sciatic nerve, aggravating the symptom; has no hesitancy whatever in stating that his death was the result of gunshot wound for which he was pensioned, said wound finally producing a final attack of tetanus.

P. H. Mosher and John D. Dain testify to the same facts. The claimant was married to the deceased some two years before his enlistment, and is the mother of two girls by said marriage, one of whom is under sixteen years of age.

This case presents a very strong claim upon the Government for a widow's pension, and while the wound in the foot from a nail might have hastened in some slight degree the predisposition to tetanus, so frequently threatened by the gunshot wound, the committee is of the opinion that the evidence of three medical experts is so strong as to exclude even the shadow of a doubt that soldier's death was the result of the wound received in battle while defending the cause of his country, and even were there any doubt in the case the benefit of said doubt in such a case as this should be given to the wi low.

The committee therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS ASKEW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1742) for the relief of Thomaas Askew.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Thomas Askew (colored), of Tyrrell County, North Carolina, who was wounded at Plymouth, N. C., in the year 1864, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. DOCKERY. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1742) for the relief of Thomas Askew, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The evidence in this case shows that applicant, Thomas Askew, was in the employ of the officers of the Government at Plymouth, N. C., as a laborer some time after its capture by the Federal forces; that in the spring of 1864, when the confederate army attacked Plymouth, N. C., he was, by order of General Wesly (or Wessels or Vesels), put in the ranks with arms and ordered in the fight, which order he obeyed, and while in the engagement he was wounded in the right arm, from the effect of which his arm was amputated one week thereafter; that he was there taken and held by the confederates as a prisoner for about six months; that in consequence of the loss of his right arm he is wholly disabled from earning a support by manual labor; that he has never received anything in the way of compensation or pension in consequence of his disability thus incurred.

This being a case in which the Pension Office has no authority to act, applicant can only receive relief from an act of Congress. Although claimant was not enlisted in the military or naval service of the Government, yet, being ordered by the general commanding at the time of an actual engagement to assist in repelling the enemy, he acted promptly and heroically, in consequence of which he was disabled and is to-day unable to earn a livelihood by manual labor.

Your committee is of the opinion that this is a meritorious claim, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANGELINE BROMAGHIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1286) granting a pension to Angeline Bromaghin, of Janesville, Minn.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the regulations and the restrictions of the pension laws, the name of Angeline Bromaghin, widow of Harvey H. Edwards, late a private in Company C, Seventh Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out in lines 5 and 6 the words "Angeline Bromaghin, widow," and insert "Agnes M. Edwards, infant daughter."

Add to the bill the words "and pay her a pension of $10 per month."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Agnes M. Edwards, infant daughter of Harvey H. Edwards."

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1286) granting a pension to Angeline Bromaghin, of Janesville, Minn., submit the following report:

Harvey H. Edwards, late husband of applicant, Angeline Bromaghin, enlisted as a private in Company C, Seventh Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, on the 12th day of August, 1861, and was discharged January 16, 1863, on account of disabilities caused by a gunshot wound in his abdomen, received in battle at South Mountain, Maryland, September, 1862, causing tenderness of left groin and severe pain in the left crural vein, with partial paralysis of the limb. The ball could not be extracted; the prospect of recovery remote and uncertain. The foregoing is a part of the record in the case, as certified to by W. O. Riddenbold, commanding post.

The soldier died, after long and severe suffering, on April 9, 1873. His widow's claim for pension was rejected on the ground that the evidence did not satisfy the Pension Office that his death was caused by the result of the wound received in battle at South Mountain, Maryland.

The evidence of reputable and disinterested witnesses is abundant that prior to enlistment said Harvey H. Edwards was a healthy and robust, rugged man; that after his discharge he was in feeble health, and suffered severely from heart and lung trouble.

William A. Fields testifies that said Harvey H. Edwards was to all appearances sound and healthy at the date of his enlistment, and that after his discharge from the Army he complained of heart and lung trouble, and that he continued to suffer and complain until he died. In this he is corroborated by William Lamot and others.

Dr. E. L. Brownwell testifies that he examined the said Edwards some time after his discharge from the Army, and came to the conclusion that the condition of his heart and lungs was the result of the gunshot wound.

Edward T. Wade testifies that he first became acquainted with Harvey H. Edwards on the 11th of May, 1871; that at that time Edwards was able to walk but little; that he was troubled with palpitation of the heart, and the arteries of his neck would throb very violently at times. I have often seen him when in his shirt sleeves when I could see the action of his heart plainly through his shirt; his ears would assume a purplish cast. I knew that he suffered more than he would tell. He was a brave, proud-spirited fellow, and would not complain, but always said he wanted to paddle his own canoe. The physicians that treated said Edwards in hospital and immediately after his discharge are both dead.

Claimant was married to said Harvey H. Edwards on the 26th day of January, 1872. She has one child, an issue of said marriage. Claimant has cared for this child, Agnes M. Edwards, unaided, the father dying when she was yet an infant. The widow subsequently married one Bromaghin. In view of all the circumstances of the case, your committee is of the opinion that the said soldier died from the effects of wound received in the line of duty, leaving an infant daughter, poor and dependent.

We therefore recommend that the name of "Angeline Bromaghin," in lines 5 and 6 of the bill, be stricken out and insert "Agnes M. Edwards, infant daughter of said Harvey H. Edwards, and pay her a pension of $10 per month," and as so amended that the bill be passed, and that the title of the bill be changed so as to read, "Granting a pension to Agnes M. Edwards, infant daughter of Harvey H. Edwards."

The amendments reported by the committee were adopted.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Before this bill is laid aside I would like some member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to explain why by these special bills a larger amount of pension is given to the infant children of deceased soldiers than is allowed under like circumstances by the general pension laws. If there be some special reason in these cases it is all right, but otherwise it seems to me wrong to select a few to receive these special allowances.

Mr. MORRILL. The idea of the committee is that where there is a minor child, and its mother, the widow of the soldier, is not drawing a pension, the minor child is entitled to $2 and the mother $8, making $10, which is just what the law would give if the pensions were allowed by the Pension Department. This is the rule which is invariably followed by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Is the mother still living?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know as to this particular case.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. I know something about this case. I am acquainted with the applicant. Her husband, who was named Edwards, enlisted in 1861, in a Wisconsin regiment. He was wounded about eleven months afterward at the battle of South Mountain. In January, 1863, he was discharged on account of his wounds. He was shot in the abdomen, which produced partial paralysis of the leg; and he suffered a great deal in his side and lungs. I knew this gentleman about three years before his death. I used to see him almost daily; and I know that he suffered a great deal during all that time, and was scarcely able to do any kind of work. He had intervals of comparative freedom from pain. In one of these intervals, he (as I thought very unwisely) took to himself a wife. I suppose that——

She loved him for the dangers he had passed,
And he loved her that she did pity him.

So they were married. The issue of the marriage was one daughter. He survived the birth of that child but a very short time—perhaps a month. He left his wife and child in extreme poverty. They were entirely dependent upon friends who were themselves unable to contribute much to their support. His widow, as many a woman has done before, married again in hopes of securing a more comfortable provision for herself. But in this marriage she was unfortunate, as her husband has been sick most of the time since their marriage. She has supported and provided for this daughter since the death of the husband in such way as she could.

I introduced a bill to give her a pension, and I could see no reason why she should not have a pension. But the committee, adopting I believe the theory that where the widow of a soldier has married again she should not be pensioned, decided to award a pension to the daughter, who is now probably twelve years old. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

GEORGE A. ROBERTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4076) for the relief of George A. Roberts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George A. Roberts, of Mankato, Minn., for disabilities incurred, as a member of Capt. William Bierbauer's company of Mankato State militia, in repelling an attack of hostile Sioux Indians upon the village of New Ulm, in Minnesota, during the outbreak of said Indians in August, 1862.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. Perhaps it would be well for the enlightenment of the Committee of the Whole that the report in this case should be read.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 4076, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

There is no dispute as to the condition of the applicant's disability from varicose veins being contracted while in the line of duty as a member of Capt. William Bierbauer's company of Mankato State militia in repelling an attack of hostile Sioux Indians upon the village of New Ulm, in the State of Minnesota, during the outbreak of said Indians, in August, 1862.

His claim was rejected on account of disability not being received in the service of the United States, but while in the service of the State of Minnesota, and further, because the claim was not prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874, as per section 4693 Revised Statutes. It is evident that had the applicant prosecuted his claim prior to the 4th day of July, 1874, he would have been entitled to and received a pension, but having failed so to do until the 17th day of June, 1881, he is barred by the statute. If the disability was slight, or the claimant shown to be in easy pecuniary circumstances, we would not advise any action on his claim, but from the evidence of Dr. W. R. McMahan, who swears that he has been "acquainted with claimant since 1862; was called to see him soon after his return from battle of New Ulm with the Sioux Indians; he was then suffering with varicose veins. I have treated him more or less ever since, but it continued to increase slowly to present time. It commenced as high up as the middle of the thigh and ran down to the feet. On the inside of the left leg near the ankle the vein is about 3½ inches wide and 10 inches long, elevating the integument about 1 inch. The right is bad enough, but this is worse. I have consulted with other surgeons in the case. The conclusion was that an operation would be hazardous and a cure not probable."

Dr. William Frisbee swears he first saw claimant in the year 1866 or 1867; was then suffering from varicose veins. "I applied silk stockings to said leg, and this last summer or spring applied rubber bandage to said limb. Leg is in bad condition."

Joshua Hodgson swears that claimant has been afflicted with varicose veins from hard marching in repelling an attack of hostile Sioux Indians upon the village of New Ulm, in Minnesota, during the outbreak of said Indians in August, 1862, to the present time. Claimant has not been at any time since 1862 able to work more than one-third of the time.

In view of the claimant's condition your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. EDNA ROBERTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3193) granting a pension to Mrs. Edna Roberts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Edna Roberts, widow of Wright Roberts, late a private in Company F, Third Ohio Cavalry, who was killed during the war of 1861 to 1865.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out at the end of the bill these words: "And that the said Edna Roberts be paid a pension of $8 per month."

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3193) granting a pension to Mrs. Edna Roberts, submit the following report:

Wright Roberts, husband of the applicant, Edna Roberts, enlised as a private in Company F, Third Regiment Ohio Cavalry, on the 26th day of August, 1862, and is reported on the muster-rolls to October 31, 1863, January, February, 1864. Name not borne on subsequent roll.

Absent, captured at Woodville, Ala., November, 1863. Name not borne on subsequent rolls of company. Prisoner of war records furnish no information. He was killed by guerrillas on or about December 19, 1863, in Jackson County, Alabama, while returning to his regiment from a temporary leave of absence to visit his family. The above is a copy of the record on file in the Pension Office. Widow's claim for pension was rejected on the ground that the soldier was not in the line of duty when killed.

The affidavit of his sons, John N. and James I. Roberts, who served in the same regiment with Wright Roberts, their father, states he was killed on or about December 19, 1863, in Jackson County, Alabama, while returning to his regiment from a temporary leave of absence to visit his family, who resided in said county and State; that his remains were found a few miles from his home, showing every evidence that he had been murdered by guerrillas, and that members of guerrilla bands have since acknowledged to them that their father was killed by them; and that at the time he was killed, if he had any written leave of absence it was on his person and destroyed by his murderers, but they know the fact that he had authority from his commanding officer to visit his family, and that he left his home for the purpose of returning to his regiment, and while so returning was killed as aforesaid.

The widow at this date is quite aged and poor. While there may be some doubt as to the propriety of the Pension Office acting favorably on the applicant's claim for a pension as the widow of deceased soldier, your committee is of the opinion that the case is a meritorious one, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill, after striking out all after the word "five," in line 9.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LOUIS ABEAR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1198) granting a pension to Louis Abear.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll of the Army the name of Louis Abear, late a private in Company H, Fifth Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, subject to the rules and regulations of the Department.

The amendment reported by the committtee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out these words, "and that the rate of pension to be allowed said Louis Abear be $12 per month."

The report (by Mr. WINANS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1198) granting a pension to Louis Abear, have had the same under consideration, and report:

That said Louis Abear enlisted in the Fifth Michigan Cavalry, Company H, at Detroit, September 5, 1862, and served to the close of the war, and was honorably discharged at Camp Chase, April 28, 1865.

It appears that he was a brave and faithful soldier, and served continuously with his regiment and company till June 9, 1864, when he was captured in a fight at Trevilian Station, Virginia, and was held a prisoner in Andersonville and other Southern prisons till the close of the war, when he was sent North and discharged by general order, with no apparent disability, for which reason, and the further one that he is entirely illiterate, he has made no application heretofore for a pension. He is now, at the age of fifty-one years, suffering from chronic catarrh and rheumatism, as appears by the affidavit of George R. Richards, M. D., surgeon Seventh Michigan Cavalry, in the same brigade (Custer's) with the Fifth, to the extent of disabling him from labor very much of the time. Said surgeon says that when he knew him in the Army he was a man of large size, of immense strength and endurance. That in his opinion his present condition is owing to his long imprisonment and sufferings consequent thereon. That said soldier is now but a wreck of his former self.

Henry Starkey testifies that he is now secretary of the Detroit board of water commissioners; that he was lieutenant in Company H, Fifth Michigan Cavalry; that he knew Louis Abear, a private in said company, and has known him since his return from the Army. He testifies as to his present disability and emaciated condition from chronic disease; also to his extraordinary strength and powers of endurance as a soldier, and his uniform good conduct and bravery while with the company, and his honesty and good reputation as a citizen, and also his entire lack of education.

Another affidavit in the case (that of Samuel T. Hendricks, of Wyandotte, Mich.) is confirmatory of the kind heart, nay, chivalry, of this strong, though rough and unlettered soldier. This affidavit says that his brother, Henry C. Hendricks, now dead, together with Louis Abear, was prisoner of war in Millen, Ga.; that his brother was sick, and by reason of scurvy and disease a mere skeleton and likely to die; that in drawing for exchange Abear was selected, but being a friend, he relinquished to his brother his chance of exchange, and allowed him to come home to his family; that he frequently before and on his death-bed heard him say that but for Abear he would never have lived to see home, and expressed a desire to in some way see him rewarded.

It would seem to your committee that the only reason this soldier is not now on the pension-roll is because of his neglect to make application therefor. The testimony of the surgeon leaves no doubt as to his present debilitated condition, nor as to his robust health and strength while in the service; neither do we think there is much room for doubt that prison life and fare for ten months, such as was given to privates at Andersonville and other Southern prisons, was the foundation of his present disability. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment—strike out all after "Department," in the seventh line.

The amendment reported by the committee was adopted.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRY B. HARRINGTON AND GRACE A. HARRINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1228) granting a pension to Harry B. Harrington and Grace A. Harrington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of Harry B. Harrington and Grace A. Harrington, children of Henry M. Harrington, late second lieutenant of Company C, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, at the rate of $15 per month each.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the guardian of said Harry B. Harrington and Grace A. Harrington the sum now due on the pension allowed to Grace Harrington, mother of said minors, who has disappeared, and whose whereabouts, if living, are now unknown: Provided, That if said Grace Harrington shall hereafter appear and be in a sane condition, competent to care for her children, this pension to said minors shall cease. During the allowance of the pension hereby authorized the pension heretofore granted to Grace Harrington, widow of said Lieutenant Harrington, shall not be paid.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1228) granting a pension to Harry B. and Grace A. Harrington, have had the same under consideration, and report:

That Harry B. and Grace A. Harrington are the orphan children of Lieutenant Harrington, who was with General Custer in the memorable battle on the Big Horn, June 25, 1876; that they are of the age of 11 and 12 years respectively; that Grace Harrington, widow of Lieutenant Harrington, and mother of said children, is supposed to be dead, as her whereabouts are unknown, and diligent search and inquiry have been made to find her by her relations without success. Said children are without any means of support, and are now living with their grandparents. The mother at the time of her disappearance, February 9, 1885, was in receipt of a pension of $17 per month as lieutenant's widow, which, under the circumstances, can not be paid.

This bill proposes to pension said children at the rate of $15 each per month, and also to pay to them, or their guardian, the arrears of the mother's pension. From the latter proposition your committee dissent. But in consideration of the great probability of the mother's death—and it is only the want of proof of that fact that prevents granting these children a pension in a legal way, and the further fact your committee are in favor of a general increase of pensions of widows and dependent parents—we recommend that the bill be amended by adding to section 1, "to be paid to their legal guardian for their use and benefit until they are sixteen years of age," and to strike out all of section 2, and that the bill so amended do pass.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LENFORD ROSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2976) granting a pension to Lenford Rose.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Lenford Rose, son of George W. Rose, late a lieutenant of Company I, Fifth Michigan Infantry, and pay him a pension of $15 a month.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2976) granting a pension to Lenford Rose, report as follows:

That Lenford Rose is the son of George W. Rose, who enlisted as a private in Company I, Fifth Regiment Michigan Infantry, August 27, 1861; was promoted to second lieutenant May 28, 1862, and to first lieutenant July 22, 1862, and captain June 23, 1863; died May 24, 1864, of wounds received in action at the battle of the Wilderness, Virginia, May 5, 1864. He left two children, Lenford and Benjamin F. Rose. Benjamin F. is poor, not worth a dollar; supports himself and family by day labor. Lenford is now thirty-one years of age; is deaf and dumb, and was so from birth. He has no use of his left arm and hand, it being withered and drawn out of shape by contraction of the muscles. George W. Rose left no property whatever at the time of his death, and the pension given the children till they were sixteen was used up in their support. Lenford Rose, on account of his infirmity, is entirely unable to earn his support, and is living on the charity of friends and neighbors, having no relatives able to give him a home.

No soldier has a better military history than George W. Rose. Had he lived his unfortunate son would not now be a homeless waif. He gave his life to his country, and this unfortunate orphan should be that country's ward.

We think this a legitimate case for Congressional relief, and recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment. In seventh line strike out the word "him" and insert "to his legally constituted guardian for his benefit."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NORMAN S. BULL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2740) for the relief of Norman S. Bull.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Norman S. Bull, late a sergeant of Company C, Sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, upon the list of pensioners, at the rate of $72 per month, in lieu of the $31.25 per month heretofore allowed him, to commence on the passage of this act and to continue during his natural life.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2740) for the relief of Norman S. Bull, have considered the same, and beg leave to report:

Said Norman S. Bull enlisted and was mustered into the service of the United States July 16, 1861, in the Sixth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, and was sergeant of company C of said regiment. He was wounded in the head or face by a gunshot wound at the battle of the Wilderness, on May 6, 1864, while in the line of duty. The ball entered the left side of his face, passing out upon the other side. The teeth, palate, and nearly or quite all the bones of his jaw were carried away. By reason of this wound he is wholly unable to masticate food; his food has all to be prepared especially for him in a fluid or liquid condition, or he can not swallow the same. When he went into the Army, and up to the time of receiving this wound, he was a healthy, strong man. The continuous suffering from this wound, and the necessity for taking liquid food only, without mastication, has made him very feeble, and, in fact, for many years little better than a skeleton. The fact that he can not eat or use food as ordinarily prepared, and the necessity of having a special kind of food, and having it prepared for him in a special manner, entails upon him a great deal of extra expense, amounting nearly, if not quite, to the expense of the regular aid and attendance of another person, which expense he is unable properly to meet, being a poor man and in a very feeble condition of health. He is now receiving a pension of $31.25 per month, but the pension law does not appear to fully cover a case like this; so his application for an increase has been denied.

There are but two cases in existence like this of loss of jaw, palate, &c., and in some of these cases, by special act, Congress has granted the same pension as is granted by the general law to persons totally disabled and requiring the regular aid and attendance of another person, which is $50 per month.

The facts in this case being fully substantiated by the papers in the case on file in the Pension Office, and by the proofs accompanying this report, your committee deem it a case in which relief should be granted, and we therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment: Strike out "seventy-two" and insert "fifty," so it shall read:

"At the rate of $50 per month, from and after the passage of this act, to be in lieu of the pension now paid him."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ASAHEL MIDDLETON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3364) granting a pension to Asahel Middleton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Asahel Middleton, late a private in Company F, Sixty-fifth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3364) granting a pension to Asahel Middleton, having given the same careful consideration, report:

That Asahel Middleton was drafted into the service September 26, 1864, and discharged therefrom April 6, 1865. On the 22d day of April, 1880, he filed his application for pension, alleging that from sleeping on cold nights in windy barracks at Indianapolis, Ind., with insufficient covering, he contracted a severe cold, which settled on his lungs, also affecting his liver and kidneys; that he continually grew worse, and that by February 1, 1865, his right lung was closed and right half of chest badly swollen from center of breast around to back, in which condition he remained until April, 1865, when an abscess in right lung broke, discharging large quantities of pus; that he is unable to learn the whereabouts of his commissioned officers, and therefore presents testimony of comrades.

This application was rejected by the Pension Department February 27, 1883, on the ground that disability existed prior to entering the service.

This decision appears to have been based solely upon the statement made by the acting assistant surgeon who signed his certificate of disability for discharge, that he had "organic disease of kidneys, with emaciation; said disqualification existed at the time of muster-in."

This testimony is rebutted by the affidavits of four neighbors—two of them physicians—who all testify from personal knowledge derived from intimate acquaintance that said soldier was sound and in good health at the time he was drafted.

Two comrades, William Huggard and George D. Perkins, testify that "while in camp, under command of officers thereof, he contracted a severe cold from exposure, which settled on his lungs, and from which lung trouble he has never recovered."

Dr. Ulris Briggs testifies that in February, 1865, he began treating claimant, then on furlough. He says:

"He had an abcess formed on liver, and another on right lung; the lung became ulcerated and broke, large quantities of pus or matter being thrown off through bronchial tubes; that ever since discharge until to-day I have known him. The right side of breast is shrunken, and the shoulder is nearly two inches lower than the other. Very little, if any, air passes into the right lung. That his present condition is the direct result of the disease for which he treated him in 1865."

Doctors Burr, Howland, Hoblett, Porter, and Eberle testify to treatment at various times, covering the entire period from discharge to 1883, and all agree as to diagnosis of case.

Two official examinations disclose the same state of facts; and the last, by a full board, says:

"On careful examination of liver, with claimant in a recumbent position, by percussion and palpation, we find only a considerable degree of atrophy of that organ. Disability, one-eighth. On auscultation and percussion we find an almost entire consolidation of right lung, with extreme flatness over that side of the chest. Respiration is confined almost wholly to left lung. We believe the disease of left lung was due to an abscess, but whether originally of the liver or lung we are unable to say. Chemical examination of urine shows no abnormal element."

It seems to be very clearly proven that claimant entered the service a sound and healthy man; that the disability for which he claims pension, namely, disease of lungs, was incurred in the service, and has been continuous since. That the "disease of kidneys," which assistant surgeon certifies in his discharge existed prior to muster, and upon which statement claim was rejected by the Pension Office, had in fact no existence before soldier entered service nor since.

In view of these facts and the further one that this man was drafted, examined, and not only permitted but compelled to enter the service, your committee believe the claimant is entitled to the relief asked for, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MINTON PRALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 626) granting a pension to Minton Prall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Minton Prall, late a private in Company C, Thirty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 626) granting a pension to Minton Prall, having considered the same, report:

That Minton Prall, late a private in Company C, Thirty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, enlisted September 3, 1861, and was discharged July 26, 1865; that while returning from a furlough, and while on his way to his regiment, he was induced by Capt. J. M. Terry, in charge of the Government bakery at Jeffersonville, Ind., to go to work in said bakery, and that on the second night, while so employed, his hand was accidentally caught in the iron rollers and his left arm injured to such an extent as to require amputation about half way to the elbow.

October 12, 1874, he filed his application for pension for said disability. It was rejected June 8, 1885, upon the ground "that claimant was not in line of duty when he lost his arm."

Claimant swears that Captain Terry compelled him to go to work in the bakery by threats of arrest; Captain Terry says he requested him to go to work because he needed more help. However, it is clearly proven that the soldier did go to work in the bakery, and that he lost his arm while so at work. Had the soldier, under like circumstances, fell in with a line of soldiers, fought, and been wounded in battle, we think the question as to line of duty would not have been raised. He was in line of duty while returning from his furlough; his furlough had not yet expired; the service he engaged in was legitimate and necessary; he lost his arm thereby.

The technicality which precludes relief at the hands of the Pension Bureau should not prevent Congress from doing justice.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN D. CLARK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3375) granting a pension to John D. Clark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of John D. Clark, late a private in Company D, Twenty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3375) for the relief of John D. Clark, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That the papers in this case, procured from the Pension Office, disclose the fact that John D. Clark was a private in Company D, Twenty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers; that he was attacked with inflammation of the eyes about January, 1862, treated by Dr. Paine, assistant surgeon of the regiment, and by him afterward sent to Winchester hospital; taken prisoner in said hospital and discharged at Washington, D. C., June 13, 1862, "by reason of his being a paroled prisoner." Above testimony all furnished by official records.

Said John D. Clark filed application for pension July 19, 1862, and again July 31, 1872, alleging that he was taken with sore eyes at Camp Muddy Branch, Maryland, about December 15, 1861; lost the sight of right eye about July 1, 1862, the left eye being blurred and very weak.

E. A. Brown, captain of Company D, Twenty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, testifies:

"Said John D. Clark was a sound man when he entered the service, and that he contracted sore eyes about December, 1861, at Camp Muddy Branch, Maryland."

Charles W. Eckerson, of Creston, Iowa, testifies:

"In 1861, and for several years prior, was resident in Shelby, N. Y., and was well acquainted with John D. Clark for five years prior to his enlistment. He was an able-bodied man, and had never been troubled with sore eyes during my acquaintance with him. When he was discharged in 1862 he came to my father's house; his eyes were very sore—could not bear light—and he was unable to perform any labor; his disability continued until affiant removed from New York, in 1864."

Like testimony is abundant as to prior soundness, and both medical and lay testimony is ample to prove conclusively the continuance of disability since, he having been at different times examined and treated by Doctors Paine, Crosswait, Denice, and Examining Surgeon George M. Coit, all of whom have affidavits filed in the case establishing the fact of disease and disability.

The latest evidence on file is a certificate of twenty-five of the leading business men of his town, certifying to an acquaintance of from twelve to twenty years, testifying to his excellent character and reputation, and that during this period he has been continuously afflicted with disease of eyes.

This claim seems to have been rejected upon the report of a special examiner sent to Shelby, N. Y., who procured affidavits from several parties to the effect that said Clark had sore eyes prior to his enlistment; but after critically examining all the evidence taken by this special examiner, it is, in the opinion of your committee, by no means sufficient to rebut or break down the abundant evidence already filed as to prior soundness. Therefore, in view of all the testimony, and the further fact that medical examinations preceding muster were quite rigid at that early stage of the war, namely, 1861, and the very strong probability that soldiers would have been rejected had there been any disease of the eyes, your committee are of the opinion that his disability was contracted in the service, and he should be pensioned. The passage of the bill is recommended.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY S. MORGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3359) granting a pension to Henry S. Morgan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry S. Morgan, late of Company D, First Regiment United States Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3359) for the relief of Henry S. Morgan, having duly considered the same, report:

This case was before the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the Forty-sixth Congress, and the accompanying report made thereon, which your committee believe is a fair statement of the facts, and therefore adopt it as their report, and recommend that the bill do pass.

"It appears from the evidence in the case on file in the Pension Office that the petitioner was a private in Company D, First Regiment United States Infantry, enlisted June 16, 1860, and discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability April 1, 1874. His declaration for pension was filed June 1, 1874, alleging—

"'That at Fort Snelling, Minn., by an accident, his left hand was crushed by a car-wheel, causing amputation about four inches above the hand; that when injured he was acting under orders of the sergeant of Company C, on detached duty, between Saint Paul and Fort Snelling, and was traveling alone on his return from Saint Paul to Fort Snelling to join his command.'"

"The Pension Office rejected the claim June 24, 1875, on the ground, 'Not in the line of duty at time of receiving the injury; was absent on a pass.'

"The board of appeals, Interior Department, confirmed the rejection November 23, 1875.

"The Adjutant-General's report for January and February, 1874, states claimant 'present at Fort Snelling sick; nature of sickness not stated. Discharged April 1, 1874, at Fort Snelling, Minn., on surgeon's certificate of disability.'

"The certificate of disability gives as cause of discharge 'loss of left hand, the result of an accident on the railroad when returning from being absent on pass to his post. This occurred 12th December, 1873. Disability total.'

'Capt. H. G. Thomas, of claimant's company, certifies that—

"'December 12, 1873, claimant, returning from Saint Paul to Fort Snelling, fell under the railroad cars in such a way that one or more wheels passed over his left hand, entirely disabling it and rendering amputation necessary. Saw claimant immediately after the accident and he was perfectly sober.'

"William Damphier, first sergeant Company D, in his affidavit, states:

"'Was present with the company at the time of claimant's accident; that a few days previous to the accident affiant had ordered claimant to dispose of his citizen's clothes, and that it was while returning from Saint Paul, Minn., where claimant says he disposed of his clothes, that he had his hand run over by the cars.'

"The examining surgeon of the Pension Office, A. Heger, M. D., December 12, 1873, found him disabled, as alleged, and the disability total.

"There is a conflict of evidence in the case, but the preponderance of the testimony, besides the moral aspect of the case, is in favor of the claimant. He had served nearly eight years in the Army, which of itself is a very good certificate in his favor. The first sergeant of his company testifies favorably in his behalf; and Captain Thomas, who saw him immediately after the accident, says he was perfectly sober.

"Your committee are in favor of giving this soldier a pension on the record, although the evidence submitted to the Pension Office may not have been sufficiently strong to authorize granting a pension there; and your committee report favorably upon the prayer of the petitioner, and recommend the passage of the bill."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BRIDGET O'BRIEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3919) granting a pension to Bridget O'Brien.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Bridget O'Brien, widow of James O'Brien, late a member of Company I, Fourteenth Regiment of Illinois Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3919) granting a pension to Bridget O'Brien, having given the same due consideration, beg leave to report:

That from a careful review of the voluminous testimony in this case on file in the Pension Office, your committee find that Bridget O'Brien is the widow of James O'Brien, late a member of Company I, Fourteenth Illinois Cavalry, who enlisted October 17, 1862, and was discharged July 31, 1865. He died October 26, 1876, of disease of bladder and kidneys. His widow filed her application for pension October 19, 1882, which was rejected April 17, 1885, "because of no medical record in service, nor for several years after discharge."

The following facts are very clearly proven by abundant and competent testimony: That claimant was sound, healthy, and strong prior to and during the first year of his service; that his service was constant and severe; that he was captured on the Stoneman raid in the rear of Atlanta in the summer of 1864, taken to the Andersonville prison-pen, and confined there for several months. On his return he was in feeble health, and so remained until his muster-out, frequently unable to perform duty, but not sent to hospital; hence, "no medical record in service." This is proven by affidavits of lieutenants and commander.

Continuance of disability and gradually failing health after discharge is fully proven by lay testimony up to 1870, and by medical testimony from that time to date of his death; and it is further proven that one Dr. Charlton, who is now dead, treated him from date of discharge until 1870.

From all the circumstances in this case, soldier's prior soundness, his arduous service, his sufferings in prison, his return therefrom enfeebled and broken in health, his continued disability and final death, your committee believe that Congress should grant the relief, which the strict letter of the law would not permit the Pension department to give. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HIRAM L. WAIT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3358) granting a pension to Hiram L. Wait.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hiram L. Wait, late a private in Company C, Third Regiment of Iowa Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3358) granting a pension to Hiram L. Wait, having given the same very careful consideration, report:

That Hiram L. Wait, late private in Company C, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteers, enlisted June 5, 1861, discharged August 26, 1865, having been previously transferred to Company 169, Second Battalion Veteran Reserve Corps. On September 25, 1866, he filed his application for pension, alleging the loss of his right arm by accident while on fatigue duty at Cairo, Ill., May 10, 1864, which claim was rejected December 4, 1883, on the ground that the injury was not received in line of duty.

The evidence on file with this case in the Pension Office discloses the following state of facts:

The regiment to which Hiram L. Wait belonged had re-enlisted, and returning from veteran furlough, arrived at Cairo, Ill., about the 8th day of May, 1864; that on the 10th the regiment was ordered to board transports for an expedition up the Tennessee River, and that after the regiment had packed their knapsacks, and were ready to proceed to the transports, the claimant was instructed by the lieutenant commanding his company to take the letters of the command to the post-office, about one mile distant, and to make all haste, in order to be in time to embark on the boats. The soldier, in order to expedite his trip, attempted to board a passing train of cars, and in so doing fell, was thrown under the cars, and his arm so badly crushed that it required immediate amputation. The rejection of this claim by the Pension Office seemed to be based entirely upon the theory that soldier was not in line of duty, because there appears to have been no special and formal order of company or regimental commander detailing the soldier to perform the duty of carrying the mail.

To those who know anything of the hurry and confusion of breaking camp, the anxiety to send a last word to loved ones just before starting on distant and perilous expeditions, it will be a very reasonable supposition that a verbal order should have been given for this soldier to do just what he did do.

The lieutenant commanding company is dead, and so it is impossible to procure his testimony, but the facts are sworn to by claimant and by one comrade, both of whom, it is proven, are men of high character and strict integrity.

The morning report of the company says: "Lost his arm in line of duty." His discharge, written across its face, says: "This soldier lost his right arm by accident, while on fatigue duty at Cairo, Ill., on the 10th day of May, 1864, while in the line of his duty," and it is certified as a true copy of a certificate by the soldier's former company commander, sent to him as a part of his military history when transferred to Veteran Reserve Corps. Discharge signed "S. Cleminshaw, second lieutenant, Veteran Reserve Corps, commanding 169 Company, Second Battalion Veteran Reserve Corps."

From all the evidence in this case your committee are of the opinion that the soldier was acting under orders from his superior officers; that the disability was incurred in line of duty, and that he is clearly entitled to a pension. Wherefore we recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT F. H. GOODE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 619) granting a pension to Robert F. H. Goode.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Robert F. H. Goode, late second lieutenant of Company F, Fifty-first Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, now residing in Centerville, Iowa, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 619, having given the same due consideration, report:

That Robert F. H. Goode was a sergeant in Company F, Fifty-first Missouri Enrolled Militia Cavalry; that he was wounded in both arms and right hip, his horse being killed under him at the time, on July 8, 1864, in a battle with bushwhackers at Hardin, Ray County, Missouri. He filed his application for pension on account of disability by said wounds August 1, 1884. It was rejected February 17, 1885, on the ground that "the organization to which the claimant belonged was not in the service of the United States. He therefore has no title to pension under existing laws."

Had this application been filed prior to the 4th day of July, 1874, the claimant would clearly have been entitled to a pension under the provisions of clause 3, section 4693, Revised Statutes, providing for pensions to State militia.

The Government has lost nothing by the delay, but has saved the amount of pension that this soldier would have drawn for over eleven years.

Your committee believe the limitation of this statute should be raised in this case, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. H. B. REHKOPF.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3351) granting a pension to Mrs. H. B. Rehkopf.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. H. B. Rehkopf, mother of Augustus Rehkopf, deceased, late a private in Company I, Nineteenth Iowa Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3351) granting a pension to Mrs. H. B. Rehkopf, have duly considered the same, and beg leave to report:

That Augustus B. Rehkopf enlisted August 6, 1862, as corporal in Company I, Nineteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, and was killed in battle December 7, 1862, at Prairie Grove, Ark. His mother, Mrs. Magdalena Rebkopf, filed her application for pension as dependent mother May 3, 1882, which was rejected June 16, 1885, on the ground of non-dependence at the time of soldier's death.

The testimony in the case established the following facts: That the father of soldier was a saddler and harness-maker at Bentonsport, a small village in Van Buren County, Iowa. The son at the date of his enlistment, and for two or three years previous, had worked at some trade in the shop with his father; that all of his earnings went into the common fund, and that the two together were able to, and did, afford a comfortable living for the family; that father was in poor health, and depended very largely on the son to do the work in the shop; that son's enlistment and death took away one-half of the income from shop; that son's pay in Army was sent home and went to the support of the family, there being at that date five minor children; soldier was a minor at death, and was never married.

The father's health continued to decline, and he died of consumption in 1863. Very thorough examinations by special examiners develop the fact that at time of soldier's death his father was possessed of a house and lot and harness-shop, all worth about $2,000, and a stock of tools and material valued at $1,000; and that the family did live without the son; and it appears that it was upon knowledge of this fact that the claim for pension was rejected.

But it is also in evidence that the business and the income therefrom materially diminished after the son's enlistment, and the mother was compelled to take boarders to help support the family. Since the father's death the mother has supported herself by keeping boarders, and with the help of such contributions as she received from her other children as they grew older.

But she is now old, and in need. She gave her first-born to help save the life of the Republic. He was in great measure her support then, and she had a right to expect that he would furnish her such substantial and material aid as would be necessary for a comfortable support in her old age. Your committee think she is entitled to a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment: From the name in the title of the bill strike out the initial letters "H. B." and insert the name "Magdalena."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY A. FOSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3367) granting a pension to Mary A. Foster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to place the name of Mary A. Foster, widow of Grigsby Foster, on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 3367, having given the same due consideration, beg leave to report:

That by special act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, the Secretary of the Interior was instructed to place the name of Grigsby Foster, late a private in Company E, Seventh Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Cavalry, on the pension-roll, subject to the requirements and limitations of the pension laws; but Grigsby Foster died previous to the final passage of this act, namely, on February 18, 1884, by reason of disability contracted in the service.

Your committee have very carefully examined the original evidence on file in the Pension Office, and upon which the special act was passed. The case was a very meritorious one. The disability for which he was pensioned originated in the service, and was so serious as to compel him to live in suffering and poverty continuously thereafter. His widow nursed him faithfully and shared with him the poverty consequent upon the disability incurred in the defense of his country, and should succeed to his pension.

We therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment to the title, so that it will read: "Mary A. Foster," instead of "Mary Foster."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. KATE MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1292) granting a pension to Mrs. Kate Miller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Kate Miller, widow of Joseph H. Miller, late a private in Company D, Second United States Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1292) granting a pension to Mrs. Kate Miller, beg leave to report as follows:

That Joseph H. Miller, the husband of claimant, was a soldier, who was first enrolled August 24, 1861, as a member of Company I, Fifth Regiment New Jersey Infantry, and discharged per General Order 154, War Department; enlisting October 28, 1862, in Company D, Second United States Cavalry. He was discharged February 28, 1864, but re-enlisted on the same date and in the same company, serving until February 28, 1867, when he was discharged by reason of expiration of term of service.

That he filed an application for a pension June 15, 1880, alleging disability from a gunshot wound of left shoulder, received September 19, 1864, in the line of his duty at Winchester, Va., while a member of the last-stated company; that before any disposition was made of the claim, on December 6, 1880, he died, leaving his widow, Mrs. Kate Miller, who has since continued the prosecution of the claim.

That the records of the Adjutant-General's office show his services as before stated; the time and place said gunshot was received; and that "roll, September and October, 1864, reports him absent, wounded, since September 19, 1864, when company was engaged at Winchester, Va., on that date." "Roll, December 31, 1864, absent, sick at McClellan hospital, Philadelphia (wounded)." "Since October 7, 1864, to February 28, 1865, on detached service at Dismounted Camp; April 30, 1865, absent, sick in hospital at Frederick City, Md., since April 7, 1865." "Rolls, October 31 and December 31, 1865, report him absent, sick in hospital at Baltimore, Md., since October 11, 1865."

That the medical testimony in the case shows him to have had, some time after his service aforesaid, severe pains in the left wrist, resulting from the gunshot wound of left shoulder, which gradually extended up the left arm to the left breast, down the side to the small of the back; that these pains became very acute and severe, extending even to the lumbar regions.

That the other testimony presented shows that this disability grew on him from year to year to such an extent that he was disabled fully and over one-half of his time, and at the time of his death, December 6, 1880, totally unfit to perform any manual labor.

That from a close perusal of the medical testimony presented it is shown that the health of Joseph H. Miller declined gradually from frequent attacks of supposed rheumatism or neuralgia, laying him up for weeks at a time; that the disability affected his spine, and that these attacks became more frequent each year until 1878, when he was totally disabled for two years, and then sought medical treatment from physicians other than his family physician, Dr. P. T. Lockwood; but, declining rapidly, died December 6, 1880.

Dr. P. T. Lockwood, of Crystal Springs, Miss., the attending physician, testifies, among other things, that the ball which inflicted this wound was never extracted; that he was satisfied at time of death, and still is of the opinion, that the nervous symptoms were from the effects of the old wounds, the ball in tracks or lodgment, as the case may be, producing lesions that gave rise to constant irritability of the nerve center, under excitement of the circulating system, engorgement, and obstruction of the heart's action, and consequent disease of the large arteries.

Dr. P. T. Lockwood's testimony is very complete, he having had the soldier under his treatment from the fall of 1869 until the date of his death.

This committee, considering the testimony presented them, and the character as a soldier and citizen of said Joseph H. Miller, as abundantly testified to, the length of time of his service, and that the testimony shows from the date of his receiving said gunshot wound up to and until the time of his death he was a constant sufferer from said wound, recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES M'ANNY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1506) granting a pension to James McAnny.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James McAnny, late quartermaster-sergeant of Company C, First Regiment New Jersey Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1506) granting a pension to James McAnny, submit the following report:

Your committee find that a similar bill was introduced into the Forty-eighth Congress, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and reported favorably by that committee. The bill passed the House, but was not reached in the Senate. Your committee adopt the report made by Mr. Bagley in the Forty-eighth Congress, as follows:

"In the petitioner's declaration for a pension he states that he entered the service of the United States on the 27th day of July, 1861, in Company C of the First Regiment New York Cavalry, and was honorably discharged at Camp Bayard, Virginia, on the 12th day of January, 1863. This statement is confirmed by the certificate of discharge.

"The claimant alleges that while on a scouting expedition near Culpeper Court House, in the State of Virginia, he was injured by his horse being shot and falling on him, which broke several of his ribs and hurt his lungs, and that at the same time and place he received a gunshot wound in left leg, and that he was treated in hospital at Washington, and also at Chester Hospital, in the town of Chester, Pa.

"The records in the Adjutant-General's Office show that he was with his company in July and August, 1862; sick and absent September and October, 1862; present for duty November and December, 1862; present, sick, January, 1863, and discharged January 12, 1863, on account of disability. Regular return, July, 1862, reports him among "absent enlisted men;" cause not stated. No evidence of wounds on company roll. From the 28th of July to the 8th of August the company (with the regiment) was in the advance of Pope's Army of Virginia, performing scout and picket duty between Culpeper Court-House and the Rapidan.

"The certificate of discharge, signed by F. V. Dayton, assistant surgeon, says that, having examined James McAnny, finds him incapable of performing the duties of a soldier because of tuberculosis, with great disability, rendering him entirely unfit for duty.

"D. B. Ingersoll, examining surgeon, under date of December 23, 1878, says, that the soldier is totally disabled, and that, judging from the evidence, it is his belief that the disability did originate in the service, and that he finds that the seventh and eighth ribs on left side have been broken, and they now press upon the lung and prevent its expansion.

"As to the applicant's condition prior and subsequent to enlistment, John Moore swears, under date of June 12, 1878:

"'That he has been well and intimately acquainted with the claimant for thirty years; associated with him frequently before and since the war, and knows of his own personal knowledge that he was a stout, healthy man before he enlisted, and free from any disease of lung or injury to leg. Had he not been so, affiant would certainly have known it. Claimant came home from the Army sick with lung disease, which has affected him ever since. Understood he was injured by his horse while in the Army.'

"Peter J. Woolston makes statement under oath substantially as above.

"John E. Cary, M. D., testifies that he has treated McAnny more or less since 1871 for consumption of left lung, which appears more affected than the right lung. 'He has been unable to work at times since I first examined him. He is a temperate man in regard to all things, so far as I know.'

"The claim was deemed inadmissible by the Pension Office because the claimant could not produce the evidence of officers or comrades or of treatment in the service.

"Judging by the claimant's own statement under oath, he did receive the injuries from which he is now suffering in the service and the line of duty, and as he has proven by credible witnesses that he was sound and healthy when he entered the service, and seriously disabled when he left, your committee conclude that he is deserving of a pension, and recommend the passage of the bill."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHILIP JACOBS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1567) granting a pension to Philip Jacobs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Philip Jacobs, late of Company F, Fifty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PINDAR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H R. 1567) granting a pension to Philip Jacobs, submit the following report:

Philip Jacobs enlisted in Company F, Fifty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers—service, a musician—September 1, 1861; was discharged August 10, 1862.

The applicant claims pension on account of disability from hemorrhoids alleged to have been contracted in the military service in January, 1862, and was rejected by the Department for the reason that the alleged disability is the result of a broken-down constitution, which existed at the date of enlistment. In the notice of rejection is a statement as follows:

"While the evidence will not justify a positive statement that the disability originated from the condition of the soldier's constitution at the time of enlistment, the record evidence is decidedly adverse to the claim for pension, and in view of that record it appears to the Department more probable that the disability originated from the condition stated than from causes connected with the applicant's military service."

The record evidence filed shows the following facts: That claimant was enrolled the 16th day of September, 1861, at Norristown, in Company F, Fifty-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, to serve three years, or during the war, and was mustered in the service a private the 16th day of October, 1861, in said regiment. On the muster-rolls of Company F of that regiment for the months of November and December, 1861, he was reported transferred to regimental band, November 16, 1861. Muster-rolls of fields and staff and bands for November and December, 1861, to June 30, 1862, report him musician, present. Discharged the service at Fredericksburg, Va., August 10, 1862, by reason of disability, and no record of origin of piles is alleged.

Examining Surgeon John Schimmet states, December 9, 1878, that he had carefully examined claimant, and that claimant is incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor from the cause stated; that the said disability did originate in the service in the line of duty, and is probably permanent; that hemorrhoids were, externally, small, of little account, but claimant complains of frequent and exhaustive hemorrhage from internal hemorrhoids.

William J. Bolton, late colonel said regiment, swears that claimant was a private in Company F; was mustered out with band in August, 1862, and that he contracted piles at Hatteras Inlet, North Carolina, the latter part of January, 1862.

William Darmon, M. D., of Philadelphia, Pa., testifies he has known claimant a great many years, before and since he was in the service; that previous to his enlistment he was a hale and hearty man; that on his return from the service he was so emaciated and debilitated he called on him professionally; that upon examination he found claimant suffering from hemorrhage of the bowels or piles internal, with great irritant inflammation and protruding of the parts, even up to that time causing him many times to keep his room and confined to the house, unable to use any amount of exertion for walking; that since his return from the Army he has not been able to do manual labor, or many times to attend to his business as a musician; also suffering from other chronic affections, rheumatism, ague, and diarrhea, the piles being the most prominent, brought on, as he believes, by exposure and overexertion, caused by long marches, wet, army life and exposure while in the United States service; that said claimant was under his treatment for these diseases at the time of making the affidavit, and in the end would cause his death.

Henry Inderleid, John Rogler, John N. Rogler, Jacob Rogler, certified to be reputable men and entitled to credit, each swear that they were well acquainted with Philip Jacobs previous to his enlistment; that he was a sound, healthy, industrious, able-bodied man, and free from piles.

From the foregoing facts the committee are justified in the conclusion that previous to and at the time of claimant's enlistment he was a sound and healthy man; that he contracted the disease complained of while in the service of his country in the line of duty, which has continued, rendering him unable to perform manual labor by which to obtain a subsistence and which will ultimately result in his death.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER TOWER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3562) for the relief of Peter Tower.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Peter Tower, late a member of the Eighth New York Heavy Artillery, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. PINDAR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3562) granting a pension to Peter Towers, submit the following report:

Peter Towers, the claimant, enlisted September 8, 1864, in Company L, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery, and was discharged June 28, 1865. His application for pension was filed June 26, 1880, claiming a pension for disability incurred in the service as a soldier in the late war. His claim was rejected by the Department on the ground that there was no record of medical treatment in the service or at the time of his discharge, and claimant's inability to furnish the necessary proof to establish the origin of kidney disease in the service.

Examining Surgeon Lemuel Cross states that he (the claimant) claimed to have pain over the lumbar region at times which hurts him to get in and out of a chair; that it is this lumbago which acts on the vaiometer that leads him to believe that his kidneys are at fault, which is corroborated by Examining Surgeon Bendall.

The claimant testifies that prior to his enlistment he resided at Esperance and Richmondville, N. Y.; occupation was farming and driving team; he enlisted in the Twenty-third Battery, New York, September 8, 1864; about January 1, 1865, was transferred to Company L, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery; while in the line of duty he contracted kidney disease; was sent to City Point Hospital; about March 20, 1865, was transferred to Stanton Hospital, Washington, D. C., where he remained under treatment until June 22, 1865, when he was discharged, and returned home; that he is unable to work at any heavy work; that he is unable to furnish medical proof of treatment for said disease immediately after his return from the service, for the reason that Dr. Cornell, who treated him for said disease, is now dead; that he does not know the whereabouts of any of his officers, and can not find them; that he can not furnish testimony of his captain (Robertson), as he (Robertson) was a prisoner at the time he (claimant) joined the regiment; that he can not furnish the testimony of Assistant Surgeon Casey, for the reason that he does not know that he was ever treated by said Casey.

The record testimony shows that claimant was on the roll of the Twenty-third Independent Battery, New York Light Artillery, for September and October, 1864, present; name not borne on roll of battery for November and December, 1864. Muster-roll of Company L, Eighth Regiment Heavy Artillery, reports him present January and February, 1865, with the remarks, "Sick in Second Division hospital;" joined January 16, 1865, and was present March and April, 1865, with the remarks, "Sick in hospital at City Point, Va." Mustered out June 22, 1865, at Washington, D. C.

The records furnish no evidence when taken sick, nor the nature of the sickness; regimental hospital record not on file. Also the claimant, Peter Towers, private Company L, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery, was admitted to Stanton general hospital, Washington, D. C., April 8, 1865, and discharged from service June 22, 1865; also that he entered Second Division (Second Army Corps) hospital, Patrick's Station, Va.; date not stated; was transferred February 16, 1865; entered depot field hospital (Second Army Corps), City Point, Va., February 13, 1865, with sprained ankle, and was transferred April 7, 1865; entered hospital steamer Connecticut; no diagnosis stated.

John Boothwick, Dr. E. Willard Boies, and Peter Hagadorn testify that they knew claimant before and at the time of his enlistment; that he was a sound, healthy, able-bodied man.

Walter Dingman swears that he well knew claimant, and that while in the line of duty, at or near Petersburg, Va., about February 15, 1865, he came to City Point hospital, disabled with kidney disease; that the facts are personally known to affiant by reason of claimant's statement. At the time he came to hospital affiant was a member of Company E, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery, and has no interest in said claim; that claimant looked bad and at the time walked with a cane.

Peter Hagadorn, private of Company E, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery, also testifies that claimant came to City Point hospital with kidney disease.

Dr. E. Willard Boies testifies, in an affidavit filed February 19, 1884, that he has seen claimant two or three times each week for years past; that claimant is only able to do very light labor, and does not believe he can do one-half the labor of an ordinary man.

Dr. John Swinburne, of Albany, N. Y., testifies that he has known claimant for about nine years, and has treated him for kidney disease; did not know him prior to enlistment; treated him first for his left hand, injured between railroad cars, and for kidney disease about May 10 and 18, June 3, 7, 12, 16, 19, and 25, 1873, and July 6, 1873; that he is unable to perform his labors as a healthful man, only about one-half.

Dr. Henry S. Gale swears that he treated him about June, 1872, for nephritic colic and chronic nephrites, and lately for vesical catarrh of bladder, treatment continuing to November 1, 1882; that he is unable to do over one-half the labor of an ordinary man; that the above disabilities still remain to the extent above stated. Affidavit filed February 19, 1884.

Lawrence King testifies that he has long known claimant, and that immediately upon his return from the Army he complained of kidney disease, contracted in the Army, and that he has complained of said disease ever since, and is unable to do ordinary labor.

John J. Dickinson also testifies that claimant was well known to him previous to June, 1865, and ever since his discharge from service he has been complaining of kidney disease, and is unable to do more than one-half day's labor.

Daniel Cady also testifies that he has been well acquainted with claimant ever since his return from the Army, and that claimant was severely afflicted with disease of the kidneys; that prior to his enlistment he knew him to be well and rugged; that he advised claimant to take medicine (niter), which he did, and that it helped him some for a time; that said disease returned, and claimant has been complaining ever since, and not been able to do a day's work that was much labor; that he, affiant, is afflicted with the same disease.

From all the evidence there seems to be no reasonable doubt that the said claimant contracted the disease for which he claims a pension while in actual service during the late war in the line of duty; that he has ever since continued to suffer therefrom, rendering him unable to perform full labor.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS WARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3309) to increase the pension of Thomas Ward.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Thomas Ward, late of Company B, Eighty-ninth Regiment of Illinois Infantry Volunteers, to $40 per month, from and after the passage of this act (certificate No. 8583).

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill No. 3309, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

This bill was favorably reported to the House in the Forty-eighth Congress and passed the House, and the report made in that Congress is adopted by this committee, and is as follows:

"This pensioner was wounded in front of Atlanta, Ga., and the left arm was amputated in consequence thereof. On this account he is now receiving a pension of $24 per month. He has proven that at the time he was discharged from the service, and ever since, he has suffered with chronic diarrhea, and that as a result of that disease he has suffered with enlargement of the liver, and paralysis of both legs has resulted, and he can move about now at all times with difficulty, and sometimes not at all.

"He is now allowed at the Pension Office all that can be given him unless he shows such a condition of total helplessness as to require the constant aid and attendance of another person. His condition is not such all the time, but the greater portion of the time it is."

In view of the foregoing facts, well established by the evidence of physicians who are attending him, as well as by other reputable testimony, this committee recommend the passage of said bill, with the following amendment: Add to the bill "in lieu of the pension now received by him."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM CONDON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 415) granting a pension to William Condon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William Condon, late a member of Company F, Ninth Regiment Iowa Cavalry, now residing in the county of Schuyler and State of Illinois, holder of pension claim numbered 213210, and pay him a pension of —— dollars per month.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) is as follows:

William Condon enlisted at McGregor, Iowa, in August, 1863, and was honorably discharged at Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 4, 1865. His application for a pension is based on the ground that he was thrown from a mule and ruptured in the rectum and testicles, which resulted in blindness. His claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions on the ground that there was no record of disease for which pension is claimed.

It appears from the evidence that the claimant had no family physician before he enlisted, and that he was a sound and healthy man. The Surgeon-General's report in his case shows, "claimant, October, 1864, in the hospital, Little Rock, Ark., sick with injuries of back from fall from a horse." His military record shows claimant in the hospital almost all the time until he was discharged, marked on the records sick. On the 6th of May, 1865, he was transferred from the hospital at Devall's Bluff, Ark., to Prairie du Chien, Wis., and was honorably discharged July 4, 1865.

The claimant testifies that while in the line of his duty, being detailed as a teamster, in 1864, he was hauling water for his company and was riding a mule, when the animal became frightened and threw him to the ground with such force that he became senseless, causing rupture of the rectum and injury to his private parts, from the effects of which he has never recovered; that the inflammation from his injuries received in fall from the mule passed to his eyes and has caused his total blindness, one of his eyeballs having burst.

James Valentine, of Company D of the same regiment, testifies that in the fall of 1864, at or near Devall's Bluff, Ark., the said Condon was thrown from a mule, he being a teamster at the time, and was very badly hurt, so much so that he was sent to the hospital, and that he did not see him again in the service; that prior to that Condon was a sound, healthy man, and was always ready for duty when called upon.

Levi J. Ross, a private in Company D of the same regiment, testifies to the same facts as James Valentine, being present at the time Condon was thrown from the mule. The military record of Ross and Valentine show that they were at the place stated at the time. James Valentine, on being examined by the Pension Department, states that Condon was injured in his head and was senseless after fall up to time he was taken to the hospital.

Dr. Ruple, who is certified to as being a reputable witness, testifies that he has been the family physician of said Condon since 1865; that he came home with an injury to his penis, apparently a bruise, and inflammation of his bladder and kidneys, which resulted in diabetes; that he treated him also in 1865 for weakness of his eyes; that Condon was also treated for prolapsus ani, and at times Condon complained of his head hurting him. That the inflammation seemed to pass to his head, and has caused total blindness, one eye having bursted. That he caused Professor Hughes, of the medical college at Keokuk, to examine said Condon, and that after a careful examination he reported that Condon's loss of sight was the slow but steady work of malarial attacks contracted in the Army in Arkansas.

Said Ruple also testifies that Condon is now very poor, and he and his wife and child are inmates of the Henderson County almshouse. When the weather is warm Condon tries to earn a few pennies by wandering about feeling his way with a stick, peddling pencils, shoe-strings, and other simple notions. And he has always in that county been regarded as strictly honest and temperate in his habits.

Dr. M. Park testifies that he has examined said Condon; he found him suffering from prolapsus ani he claiming that these afflictions came on by being thrown from a mule while in the Army; that from his acquaintance with said Condon for the last ten or twelve years, he has no doubt of the truth of his statements.

A large number of Condon's neighbors who knew him both before and since the war certify that Condon's claim for a pension is meritorious, and they earnestly ask that he be granted a pension.

The board of medical examiners at Burlington, Iowa, May 1, 1878, examined said Condon, directed by the Commissioner of Pensions to examine him carefully for traces of former syphilis. They report after a careful examination that he had none.

The Grand Army Republic Post, No. 172, of which said Condon is a member, speak of his case as follows:

"Hon. W. W. DUDLEY,
"Commissioner of Pensions, Washington, D. C.:

"SIR: By the unanimous request of Ellsworth Post No. 172, Grand Army of the Republic, we do hereby submit to your consideration a statement of the case of William Condon, late a private of Company F, Ninth Iowa Cavalry, whose application for pension is numbered 319956, and whose case has been bungled up by his attorneys. The said Condon enlisted in August, 1863, at McGregor, Iowa, and was discharged at Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 4, 1865. While in the line of duty at or near Brownsville, Ark., about the month of July or August, 1864 (having been detailed as a teamster), on returning with four mules he had taken to water, the mule upon which he was riding became fractious and threw him violently on the pommel of his saddle, the pommel between his testicles and rectum. He fainted from pain, falling off the mule, and remained unconscious for a long time, when he returned to consciousness.

"Levy Ross, James Valentine, and two or three others whom he does not remember, came to where he lay and conveyed him to the corral, where he lay for a few days, when he was taken to his regiment at Brownsville, Ark. Remaining there two days, he was sent to Devall's Bluff hospital, Arkansas, where the surgeon told him he could not do anything for him. Continued to remain at said hospital until April 25, 1865, when he was ordered, with seven others, whose names he does not remember, to Prairie du Chien hospital, Wisconsin, being there employed as night-watch until discharged. The said Condon having become blind since his discharge makes it essentially one of our duties, believing his to be a meritorious case, to extend to him all the aid in our power."

After considering all the evidence, your committee is of the opinion that Condon entered the service a sound and healthy man, and was discharged a physical wreck, completely broken down in health from injuries received while in the line of his duty as a soldier. He has become blind and otherwise disabled. His case is one that appeals strongly for sympathy.

Your committee recommend that said bill do pass, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "company" in fifth line of the printed bill and insert the words "F, Ninth Regiment of Iowa Cavalry, and pay him a pension according to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GILES C. HAWLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 424) to amend the record of Giles C. Hawley, and to place his name on the pension-roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to gentlemen representing the Committee on Invalid Pensions that in this case, although the bill is upon the Calendar, the report has not been received from the Public Printer.

Mr. WINANS. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

THOMAS T. SMITHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 427) for the relief of Thomas T. Smithers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Thomas T. Smithers, late a private in Company D, Twenty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and to pay him a pension at the rate of ——dollars per month from the —— day of ——, 188-.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) is as follows:

Thomas T. Smithers enlisted August 10, 1861, in Company D, Twenty-eighth Illinois Volunteers, and was discharged March 25, 1862, for disabilities. He applied for a pension July 14, 1879. The case was rejected March 10, 1883, on the ground that the military record of said Smithers shows that the disease—fistula in ano and piles—for which said Smithers claims a pension existed prior to enlistment. The certificate of disability from which said record was made was dated February 25, 1862, at Fort Herman, Kentucky, by G. F. Farwell, captain, and in command of the company. Said certificate states that—

"The said soldier has been unfit for duty forty days. The disease, though unknown to me, seems to have existed prior to enlistment."

It appears from the evidence that the said Smithers has been suffering from the said disease ever since his discharge, and that he has been disabled all of that time from the effect of the same fully one-half, and at many times he is a great sufferer from the effect of the same.

Hugh Ervin, the quartermaster of said regiment, testifies as follows: That said Thomas T. Smithers was frequently detailed to assist him in the duties pertaining to his office, and he particularly remembers his being detailed to assist building the barracks at Fort Holt, Kentucky, which required good, able-bodied men to perform the work, and never heard said Smithers complain of not being able to perform any task imposed on him, but, on the contrary, he was always ready and willing to cheerfully perform any such duty, and was considered a stout and able-bodied man, and that he was acquainted with the said Smithers for several years prior to his enlistment in the service, and he was always considered a stout, able-bodied man, capable to perform any kind of manual labor.

All the evidence agrees that he was a good, faithful, and industrious soldier up to the time of his sickness at Fort Holt, and that he had performed his duty well. Some half a dozen or more of his comrades testify to the hard marching said Smithers did in going from Fort Holt to Camp Crittenden, and that in said march said Smithers was taken sick and never recovered while he remained with the regiment, and that he was discharged on account of said sickness.

Isaac C. Hillyer, a comrade who enlisted in the said regiment with the said Smithers, testifies that said Smithers and himself were examined in a nude condition by the medical examiner at Camp Butler at the time of enlistment, and that said Smithers was very carefully and minutely examined by the surgeon, and was pronounced sound and able-bodied. A large number of Smithers's neighbors and acquaintances, who knew him intimately, some of whom knew him from a small boy, testify that he was an able-bodied man up to the time of enlistment, and free from fistula in ano or piles.

Isaac Turris testifies that said Smithers and himself followed well-digging just prior to said Smithers's enlistment, and that it would have been impossible for said Smithers to have had fistula in ano or piles without his knowing, and that he was a sound man, free from said disease.

William M. Sipe testifies that he knew said Smithers for about ten years prior to his enlistment; that for three years next prior to his enlistment he was with him almost daily, being employed with him at the depot of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, and engaged with him in shoveling grain, pushing cars, and all other kinds of hard manual labor arising from such a position, and knew of his own knowledge that he (Smithers) was not at that time afflicted with fistula in ano. On the contrary, he was one of the most rugged and able-bodied men in the community.

William Hammer and M. A. Jones make similar statements.

Your committee are clearly of the opinion that that part of said military record, that said Smithers's disability existed prior to enlistment, was an error, made probably for the sole purpose of getting said Smithers dismissed from the service.

Your committee, therefore, recommend that the bill be amended as follows: Strike out all after the words "pay him a pension," and insert the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and that the bill do pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN C. FREES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1989) granting a pension to John C. Frees.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John C. Frees, late of Company I, One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The claimant was enrolled August 4, 1862, at Reading, Pa., in Company I, One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was discharged March 19, 1863, for disability.

Claimant alleges that about September 5, 1862, he came under the treatment of T. A. Helwig, assistant surgeon, One hundred and twenty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, for ulcerated varicose veins of left leg, and the next day was sent to the division hospital at Alexandria, Va., where he remained until October 31, 1862, when he rejoined his company at Maryland Heights, Va. December 2, 1862, was sent to Chestnut Hill hospital, Philadelphia, where he remained until discharged. The varicose veins kept growing worse until November 27, 1875, when the leg was amputated above the knee. This claim was rejected upon alleged evidence showing that varicose veins existed prior to enlistment, and were not due to claimant's military service.

Your committee have carefully examined the evidence of various persons who knew him prior to his enlistment, and they all testify that he seemed to be a hearty, active man, who was constantly on his feet, moving about in the pursuit of his vocation, which was that of a peddler, and that they never heard him complain of his legs. That varicose veins existed in this soldier's leg is entirely a matter of inference from their rapid development after he was exposed to the fatigue and hardships of a soldier's life. But your committee are of the opinion that any such inference is not justified by any evidence, and that it would in this instance work a great hardship on claimant, who is very poor, a cripple, and left by the death of all his relatives entirely alone, and to a considerable extent helpless. He earns a precarious subsistence by keeping an open-air fruit stand.

The point in this case which most forcibly impresses your committee is the fact that not only is an inference prejudicial to the claimant drawn from the rapid progress of the disease and the absence of any direct proof as to the soundness of the leg prior to enlistment, but that this inference is drawn in spite of the fact that the claimant passed a physical examination by regularly appointed examining surgeons.

Your committee therefore report favorably, and recommend that the bill do pass, with the following amendment: On line 4, after the words "pension-roll," strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and add, after the word "volunteers," on line 7, the following words: "and that he receive —— dollars per month from the date of the passage of this bill."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANDREW J. PUTNAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2161) granting a pension to Andrew J. Putnam.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Andrew J. Putnam, late of Company A, One hundred and eighty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

Claimant was enrolled March 1, 1864, as a member of Company A, One hundred and eighty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and honorably discharged on the 3d of August, 1865.

Enos W. Barnes, special examiner, reports as follows:

"Claimant says he received an injury in service and line of duty on or about August 20, 1864, from which he has since been disabled. A 'remark' opposite his name on the case-book of G. H. at York, Pa., in the spring of 1864, shows him to have been admitted there for 'chronic nephritis,' having sustained an injury to his back by a log rolling upon or against him about one year previous to his enlistment. The claim had been rejected upon the strength of this 'record,' but was subsequently reopened. The chief object of the special examination was to ascertain the facts as to claimant's physical condition at and immediately prior to his enlistment. To this end I pushed an earnest and careful inquiry. The absence of the medical evidence as to his condition at return from the service is to be regretted, and prevents a 'thorough' rating of the investigation; still I think a careful analysis of the testimony herewith submitted will satisfy the board of review and the honorable Commissioner that the claim is a meritorious one.

"The claimant denies in straightforward terms the correctness of the adverse hospital record at York, Pa. No evidence could be found by me to shake the force of claimant's denial. He claims to have been, with others, detained there unreasonably and without just cause, and they even formed plans for 'escape,' so as to get to the front for active duty. Arriving at 'the front,' claimant entered heartily into heavy work, and continued it until August 20 or 21, when he alleges incurrence of injury for which he claims pension. Claimant's denial of ever having received an injury to back from a log prior to enlistment is firmly supported by the sworn statement of his wife, who is an intelligent, conscientious, Christian woman, and gave her testimony without knowing what 'the trouble' was or what hindered her husband's claim for pension. Her evidence is interesting, and is believed by the special examiner to be both competent and trustworthy.

"The testimony of every witness examined agrees that claimant was rugged at and prior to enlistment, and that they never knew or heard of his having been hurt by a log, or otherwise injured 'about a year,' or at any other time, previous to enlistment. Upon this point I pushed inquiry faithfully, and far beyond anything shown in the evidence, but could get no adverse hint or light. Had the York hospital record been true, I feel certain it could have been verified, at least in part. Martin N. Davis, a neighbor, worked in that same sawmill up to within eight months of claimant's enlistment. He 'dreaded' claimant as a rival sawyer on account of his energy and activity at that heavy work. If Martin Davis is right, and he takes his dates from entries in his account-books of that ante-bellum period, the adverse hospital record is in error so far as it relates to claimant. Mr. Davis is an intelligent and worthy citizen, and his testimony was given guardedly; it is worthy of careful consideration. I am persuaded that the adverse hospital record at York, Pa., is unjust as to claimant. There is much evidence to support my theory, and none to the contrary. Being so persuaded, I recommend that the claim be admitted."

James C. Criner 'worked hard with claimant before the war," and he was then considered as 'rugged a man" as possible. Claimant tried to work in sawmill after the war but was unable to do so; also "not able to perform manual labor since."

James Campbell, neighbor, says:

"He has known claimant since a boy; he worked for deponent on farm in 1863, and many times previously. He was then a stout, healthy man; did not ask for a better workman."

Lieutenant Culver, of Company A, One hundred and eighty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, says:

"He knew claimant prior to enlistment a few years; when he left he was in good health and strength. He was marked as a model, willing, and earnest worker."

The evidence as to "rugged health" of claimant is as strong as it could possibly be, and is given by his neighbors and companions, who all knew him well and worked in his company. They testify uniformly as to his being a "rugged and healthy man." It is also testified that as a worker he was notorious in his company, so that his captain on one occasion endeavored to moderate his zeal, and said to him, "You do the work of two men." This state of "rugged health" and hard work on part of claimant continued until the 19th or 20th August, 1864, when, while under arms near Petersburg, Va., and in night-time, he was knocked down suddenly, as is supposed, from the effects of a bursting shell. He was stunned and unable to get up without help; his captain assisted him to his feet; his gun-stock was shattered to pieces. He was not able to go on with his regiment next day on account of injury to back and severe pain caused thereby. Your committee will continue the statement of this gallant soldier in his own words:

"Captain Hart thought I would have to go to the hospital at once, but I begged not to go, thinking I would get better. I did get some better after a few days and tried to do duty, but I found I could not stand it, and after a couple of weeks or so I gave up and went to hospital. Before I went, and after I was hurt by shell, I was taken with piles and have never been free from them since. I have had continuous trouble from my back ever since."

The committee does not think it necessary to enlarge upon the testimony as to the character and services of this hard-working and plucky soldier, and it seems to them hard that a mere hospital "note" attached to his name in the records at York, Pa., where he had gone to be treated for diarrhea, and where he was detained longer than he thought necessary and against his protestations, should be instrumental in keeping claimant for so long a time from the reception of his well-merited pension. As regards the amount of disability the evidence is equally strong and to the point. After his discharge he learned the trade of harness-making, in the expectation that he would be able to pursue it and earn his living; but he found that he was mistaken, his injury even preventing his laboring at that. His wife testifies that she herself does all the hard work of the farm, with occasional hired help, and that her husband is frequently unable to do even the chores. Frequently, also, he is confined to his bed for weeks at a time.

In view of this statement of well-established facts, your committee unanimously and earnestly recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ADA O. KREPPS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3632) granting a pension to Mrs. Ada O. Krepps.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Ada O. Krepps, widow of Lieut. John B. Krepps, deceased, late of Company K, Second Regiment Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

John B. Krepps, the husband of the claimant, was first lieutenant Company K, Second Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, and received two wounds in battle—one a gunshot wound of left wrist, and the other a gunshot wound of left hip—for which he was in receipt of a pension at the time of his death, which occurred January 9, 1881. The within claim for pension was rejected on the grounds that her husband's death from inanition was not shown to be the result of the wounds which he had received.

The testimony of Dr. Duncan, who for many years was this soldier's medical attendant, and whose standing is reported good, is to the effect that the soldier often complained to him of unnatural feeling and pain in his lower extremities, and that he was frequently obliged to get up and walk about during the night to relieve this. This feeling of numbness continued to increase until he eventually became paralyzed in the lower half of his body, dying of inanition. He states that the progress of the disease and the course it took showed plainly "progressive degeneration of some kind" in the spinal cord, which terminated fatally. He futher states that the ball entered the left hip, was taken out on left side close to spinal column, as shown by the cicatrix, and that, in his opinion, the shock or concussion sustained by the spinal cord at time of being wounded was sufficient to interfere with the nutrition of the cord in after years so as to cause the fatal degenerative disease which caused his death.

Your committee are also of the opinion that the cause of this soldier's death was as is stated by Dr. Duncan—that it was the result of injuries received while in the line of duty—and they therefore recommend that his widow be placed on the pension-roll and that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSIAH B. SNELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1032) granting a pension to Josiah B. Snell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Josiah B. Snell, father of Alonzo W. Snell, late a private in Company G, Thirtieth Regiment of Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) is as follows:

Josiah B. Snell filed a claim for pension as dependent father of Alonzo W. Snell, late a private in Company G, Thirtieth Regiment Maine Volunteers, who died at New Orleans, La., of chronic diarrhea, April 13, 1864. Claim was rejected upon ground that claimant was able to support himself at the time of soldier's death; was but forty-seven years old in 1864, and found to be only one-fourth disabled in 1881.

The petition of claimant to Congress sets forth at considerable length—

"That he was dependent upon said son for support, and that his labor up to the time of his enlistment went wholly for the support of himself and family; and that when he enlisted he paid over to him, the said Josiah B. Snell, the amount received as bounty, which he used for the benefit of himself and family. * * * That at the time of the enlistment of said Alonzo W. he was in possession of a small piece of land situated in Mercer, * * * but he never had a deed of the land for the reason that he never paid for the same. The amount agreed to be paid for said land was $225."

Claimant further sets forth, in substance, that he was exempted from taxation by the town on account of his poverty several years, about the time of his son's enlistment, and that he is at present badly crippled by rheumatism and by bone sores in his arm and leg, from which large pieces of bone have from time to time come. The following points are fully established by the evidence on file in the Pension Office:

By C. H. Allen and C. N. Wood, assessors of Mercer, that the amount of real estate taxed against Josiah B. Snell from 1861 to 1865, inclusive, was $120 each year.

By W. M. Higgins and Anthony Brackett, assessors, 1881, that on account of said Snell's infirmity and poverty the taxes assessed against him in 1874 were abated by vote of the town, and also in subsequent years.

By five different affiants, neighbors, that at time of son's enlistment in 1864 claimant was a poor man; wife sick with consumption; needed all the help his son could give him; said son was faithful to his parents; father received pay for son's labor in provisions for use of the family; son worked for them on their farms, and they paid the father for such service.

By Charles H. Allen, selectman, that claimant, as shown by town records, received $273, State aid, in 1864 and 1865.

By several witnesses, showing soldier's contributions to the support of his parents.

Claimant's crippled physical condition is also fully established. Dr. Hiram R. Corson, of New Sharon, Me., states that he was called to see Josiah B. Snell April 21, 1884, and found him totally disabled.

"His disability was caused by disease of bone of right arm, causing severe swelling and inflammation of the entire arm and hand. Have examined him since above date, and find varicose veins of both legs, the abdomen, and left groin, some of the veins being very large. His right shoulder is deformed, apparently the result of an injury. I believe said Snell is now able to perform about one-third or one-fourth of a man's work."

The report of G. A. Wilbur, examining physician, made October 20, 1881, shows substantially the same physical disability.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANDREW J. HILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1471) increasing the pension of Andrew J. Hill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Andrew J. Hill, late adjutant of the Third New Hampshire Regiment, at the rate of $25 per month, in lieu of the sum now paid him.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) is as follows:

Andrew J. Hill is now over eighty years of age, and has served his country in two wars. For disabilities incurred in the war with Mexico (diarrhea and liver complaint) he was pensioned at the rate of $4 per month, which continued until the outbreak of the civil war, when he surrendered it and again entered the military service as adjutant of the Third New Hampshire Regiment.

He resigned his commission April 8, 1862, on account of disabilities incurred under circumstances stated as follows by his colonel, John H. Jackson:

"While present with his regiment at Edisto Island, on or about April 4, 1862, in the line of his duty, engaged in bringing an order to affiant from one of the outposts, his horse shied while passing through a gateway, causing claimant to be thrown heavily to the ground, and severely injuring his left hip, knee and ankle, disabling him to a considerable extent, so that he was incapacitated from performing but very little military duty until his resignation was accepted."

He was pensioned for said disability at the rate of $8.50 per month, and his claim for increase is rejected "on the ground that the claimant is now receiving pension commensurate with the degree of disability found to exist by reason of injury to left leg."

This decision is antagonistic to the conditional recommendation of the Portsmouth examining board, contained in their report of his final medical examination, under date August 26, 1885, as follows:

"Upon examining the applicant we find the following objective conditions, which, in our judgment, do entitle him to an increased rating: Injury to left leg; measurement makes the left leg an inch larger than the right; no especially tender points; increase in size extends from thigh to ankle. * * * He locates his sciatic pain along the course of the internal saphenous vein, which is marked with varicosities from thigh to ankle, and to which we attribute the increase in size of leg. We should rate him something for the varicosities if there was evidence that they were contracted in the service, say three-eighths, conditionally."

Also, as indicating the claimant's physical condition, we have the joint affidavit of William H. Sise and W. S. Walker, two highly respectable citizens of Portsmouth, that on account of his lameness he is almost totally incapacitated from following his occupation as house-joiner, and the statement of S. C. Whittier, M. D., late surgeon Twenty-third Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, under date February 9, 1883, as follows:

"I hereby certify on honor that I am the family physician of Alfred J. Hill, of this city, who has been under my care, professionally, for the past five years most of the time. Mr. Hill has been an invalid for most part of the time, and a part of it he has been mentally as well as physically in a very precarious way. At the present time his health is much better than for a long time previous. He has not been fit or able to do manual labor for the past two or three years, nor is he now able to do any work, either mental or physical, and will never, in my opinion, be in condition to do any kind of labor. I consider him a broken-down man, and, as he claims, I think the service rendered by him during the late war had much to do with his present debilitated condition. I am free to say that I think he should have a full pension, and hope that this statement may be instrumental in producing that result."

In consideration of his patriotic services in two wars, of his advanced years, and of his established disability beyond that for which he is pensioned and very likely attributable to the same injury, we recommend that he be given the full disability pension of his rank and report the bill favorably with the following amendment, viz: In line 6, strike out the words "twenty-five" and insert the word "seventeen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY G. COLBY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1474) granting a pension to Mary G. Colby.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, the name of Mary G. Colby, widow of Amos C. Colby, late a private in Company I, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, said pension to commence from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) is as follows:

Mary G. Colby is the widow of Amos C. Colby, formerly a private in Company I, Third New Hampshire Volunteers. She is sixty-eight years of age, and claims a pension by reason of her husband's death (December 30, 1882), resulting, as she contends, from disability contracted during his army service, from August 11, 1862, to May 7, 1863, when he was discharged. Said Colby, on his application and accompanying proofs, was allowed a pension for sciatica or chronic rheumatism, of $6 per month from the time of his discharge to September 24, 1881, and thereafter $8 per month until he died.

The widow's claim was rejected at the Pension Office, September 23, 1885, on the ground that the cause of her husband's death, viz, pneumonia, "was not due to or connected with his military service."

The evidence filed in the Pension Office shows clearly that the deceased was a sound and healthy man when he enlisted, and that his discharge was ordered solely on account of his permanent disability from rheumatism. From the time of the soldier's return home from the Army, on crutches, to his decease, in 1882, the history of the case is one of increasing debility and gradual decline.

Dr. W. B. Moody, a reputable examining surgeon, certifies that he frequently treated him from discharge until death; that Colby had a mild attack of pneumonia a few days before his decease, which was confined to the right lung, and would not have proved fatal if nothing else had ailed him; that the soldier had long been and was incurably diseased from rheumatism, sciatica, heart trouble, and diarrhea, caused by his army service; and in Dr. Moody's opinion Colby could have survived but a short time even if the pneumonia had not intervened. The truth really is that the soldier's strength and vitality had become so much reduced by the long-continued and increasing severity of his disability contracted in the Army—and for which his pension was granted—that he was unable to withstand a very slight attack of pneumonia, and therefore died.

This is the opinion concurred in by two good physicians who had known the deceased ever after his discharge, and who attended him during his last illness.

Mrs. Colby is an old lady, and needs the pension for her support.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADDIE L. MACOMBER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1462) granting a pension to Addie L. Macomber.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Addie L. Macomber, a volunteer nurse in the late war, giving her the sum of $25 a month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) is as follows:

Addie L. Macomber was one of the noble women who performed so important a service in ministering to the sick and wounded during the war for the Union. The papers filed with the committee show long and almost continuous service, a faithful performance of duty which endeared her to those under her charge, and present physical infirmities and weaknesses of a serious character attributed to her labors in the hospitals.

In her own statement she says:

"I entered Camden Street United States General Hospital, Baltimore, in the spring of 1862; remained there continuously till 1865, with the exception of three months' leave of absence for the benefit of my health. In lifting my sickest patients to administer food and medicine I injured myself severely, and the effect of that injury will follow me through life. I became a widow in 1861, and I have no property, real, personal, or mixed. I am unfitted to do heavy manual labor, and am unable to obtain a position in the Departments on account of the civil-service law; am entirely dependent upon my own exertions for support."

The Surgeon-General, United States Army, certifies the period of Mrs. Macomber's service as from July 9, 1862, to April 14, 1864, and from August 28, 1864, to May 23, 1865, and there are several testimonials as to the character and efficiency of her services.

From John Neff, M. D., of Baltimore, Md., formerly assistant surgeon, United States Army:

"This certifies that Mrs. Addie Macomber was a nurse in the wards of which I had charge in Camden Street United States Army General Hospital, Baltimore, during the years 1862-'63-'64, and that she was faithful and efficient in the discharge of the arduous duties of her position, doing much to alleviate the sufferings of our sick and wounded soldiers."

Thomas G. Haviland, of Georgetown, D. C., says:

"This will certify that during the war of the rebellion (1861 to 1865) I was on duty in the Camden Street General Hospital, Baltimore, Md., as a hospital steward, United States Army, and am cognizant of the fact that Mrs. A. L. Macomber rendered faithful and efficient service therein as a nurse for more than two and one-half years."

P. H. Wheeler, of Washington, D. C., formerly of Company A, Sixteenth Massachusetts Volunteers:

"During our late war, in the summer of 1862, I was a patient in the soldiers' hospital, Baltimore, Md. Mrs. Addie L. Macomber was in charge, as nurse, of our ward in said hospital, and I am pleased to certify that she was faithful, attentive, and always willing and ready to render assistance with that patience and kindness which endeared her to us all."

And most significant of the affectionate regard in which she was held for her good works by our sick and wounded soldiers, was the following memorial, addressed to her and bearing the signatures of twenty-eight soldiers, representing thirteen States:

"We, your patients in the Camden Hospital, take occasion, on the eve of your departure from among us, to express our regret in sustaining the loss of one whom we have learned to love as a friend and esteem as a faithful nurse—one who understands and is competent to provide for the wants of men in our situation. If in after years trouble shall gather around thy pathway and the course in life seems dark and cheerless, turn to this page of love's labor and here find the encouragement we desire to extend you; and whether you shall again come among us to make cheerful the sick couch or to bind the fractured limb, or shall choose to pass the remainder of your days amid the quiet of your native State and among the cherished friends of earlier times, carry with you the assurance that our kindest wishes go with you, and that you will retain a warm place among those of our remembered friends."

Caroline B. Winslow, M. D., of Washington, D. C., certifies:

"I have known and treated Mrs. Addie L. Macomber for prolapsus recti and uteri, which she informed me, sixteen years ago, when first my patient, she contracted by lifting patients and overwork while acting as nurse in military hospital during the civil war."

The committee think Mrs. Macomber's services fully entitle her to the recognition which has been accorded to others of her class, and recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment, namely: In line 6 strike out the words "twenty-five" and insert the word "twelve."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

LYDIA A. NELSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1456) granting a pension to Lydia A. Nelson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lydia A. Nelson, widow of the late John W. Nelson, of Company K, Fourteenth Regiment of New Hampshire Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) is as follows:

Lydia A. Nelson is the widow of John W. Nelson, formerly of Company K, Fourteenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, who was pensioned for gunshot wound in right foot. He died July 22, 1879, of peritonitis, as established by a post-mortem examination. The widow's claim was rejected upon the ground that the soldier's death resulted from disease originating after his discharge. There is not a line of direct evidence on file indicating that his fatal disease was contracted subsequent to his discharge. On the contrary, every inference to be drawn from the evidence connects it with his military service, and the only defect is that it is not medically established.

We append to this report the evidence as briefed by the Pension Office, and recommend the passage of the bill.

BRIEF OF EVIDENCE FROM PENSION OFFICE RECORDS.

"Benjamin P. Hagget, late of Company K, Fourteenth New Hampshire Volunteers (service and presence verified by Adjutant-General): 'That in July, 1863, while the regiment was encamped at Gales's woods, near Washington, D. C., he first heard soldier complain of a "trouble in his stomach," and afterward heard him complain frequently of the same trouble in his stomach, and was often obliged to be excused from duty. He was sound and robust before enlistment. Frequently saw him after discharge, and he said always that he was still troubled with the trouble in his stomach.'

"Benjamin Baker, comrade and tent-mate (service and presence verified by Adjutant-General): 'About July, 1863, he began to complain of pain in the stomach. Have known him to be excused from duty on account of said pain. Have known him to get medicine from the surgeon for it. Saw him almost every day after his discharge until he left Pembroke, in 1879, and during all of this time heard him frequently complain of pain in his stomach.'

"Frank P. Robinson, comrade (service verified by Adjutant-General): 'While in service heard soldier complain of trouble in his stomach, and was frequently excused from duty. I saw him occasionally from discharge until his death, and whenever I asked him after his health he would speak of still being troubled with the stomach difficulty. He was in good health at enlistment, and always attributed his troubles to exposure and lying on damp and cold ground, and to eating salt food.'

"Butler H. Phillips, M. D., testifies 'that his books show that he treated him in 1865, but does not remember the disease, but thinks, from his prescriptions, it was stomach troubles.'

"Moses W. Russell, M. D., testifies: 'Was called to treat him first in 1873. He had a severe attack of peritonitis. He represented to me at the time that he had been subject to such attacks at regular intervals for several years. Have given him medicine several times, but was not his regular M. D. Was present at post mortem July 22, 1879. There was abundant evidence of peritonitis of long standing. It involved the peritoneal covering of the intestines and omentum. His death was undoubtedly caused by a recent attack of same disease, system being greatly weakened by the previous and repeated attacks.'"

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARY E. SAWYER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3452) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary E. Sawyer.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Sawyer, widow of the late Samuel Sawyer, late of Company K, Twenty-third Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) is as follows:

Samuel Sawyer was a pensioner at the rate of $4 per month by reason of disease of lungs contracted while in the military service as a private in Company K, Twenty-third Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers. He died May 24, 1885, and widow's claim was rejected from evidence showing relation between cause of death and cause for which pension was claimed being insufficient under the rules of the Pension Office.

George E. Allen, M. D., of Auburn, N. H., makes affidavit as follows:

"I am a physician, and attended Samuel Sawyer, a pensioner, in his last illness, and the said Sawyer died in said Auburn on the 24th day of May, 1885, by reason of paralysis from tubercular meningitis, which, in my opinion, was induced by disease incurred in the service of the United States, and for which he was in receipt of a pension."

In response to a subsequent inquiry from the Pension Office, he says:

"My diagnosis was not in any way verified by an autopsy. In my opinion, some of the tuberculosis material was carried to the meninges of the brain, which caused the paralysis."

Dr. Allen's veracity and good reputation are vouched for by the postmaster at Auburn. While the evidence is not conclusive under the rules governing the Pension Office, it seems to be all that the circumstances of the soldier's death renders possible to procure. It is direct and explicit, and in equity should not be ignored to the widow's distress and disadvantage from a lack of cumulative evidence.

We recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE H. CAMPBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 291) granting a pension to George H. Campbell.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George H. Campbell, late lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and sixth Illinois Infantry Volunteers of the late war, and to pay him a pension as provided in such laws.

The report (by Mr. NEECE) is as follows:

The claimant, George H. Campbell, entered the service August 17, 1862, as lieutenant-colonel, and was discharged in April, 1863, on account of disability for service. At the time of his discharge he was lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and sixth Illinois Regiment. He filed his application for a pension October 9, 1882, for a rupture of the left side, caused while in the line of his duty near Jackson, Tenn., in January, 1863, and contracted by hard riding on his horse and jumping across a ravine. The military record of the claimant furnishes, however, no record of said disability. The evidence shows that the claimant was sick and unfit for duty after December, 1862, and that on account of being sick he tendered his resignation, the surgeon of the regiment recommending that said resignation be accepted. On the ground that there is no record evidence that hernia existed in the service, his pension claim was rejected. A. H. Lanphier, who was surgeon of the regiment, certified April 10, 1863, that said claimant was suffering from pulmonary tubercular disease.

The evidence of Dr. L. L. Leeds, who was claimant's family physician before he entered the service, and a large number of reputable witnesses, who were well acquainted with said Campbell, testify that said claimant was a sound and healthy man before entering the service; and it is very clearly established that when he returned from the Army in April, 1863, he was sick, and has remained in bad health ever since. The evidence establishes the fact that claimant, while in command of his regiment, in November, 1862, forced his horse to jump a ravine, and that the claimant was thrown on the horse's neck; that he seemed at the time to be badly hurt; that immediately after the claimant became sick, and for a while spat bloodfreely; that claimant continued to fail in health up to the time he resigned, in April, 1863.

These facts are testified to by Col. Robert B. Latham, who was colonel of the regiment; that immediately upon claimant returning home sick he called on Dr. Leeds, who treated him, and that he got no better; that he called upon Dr. Leeds again, and the latter, learning of the strain resulting from the riding and jumping above alluded to, caused the claimant to strip, and, for the first time, learned that he was ruptured in the left groin, from which rupture he is still suffering. This examination was made within ten days after the claimant returned home from the Army. The claimant swears that he did not know that he was ruptured until informed of the fact by Dr. Leeds; that he was treated for the same ailment while in the service, but that neither he nor the doctor knew that he was ruptured; and he further swears that he was not ruptured before entering the service of the United States.

It appears conclusively, from the evidence, that said rupture has been growing worse ever since, until the claimant is totally disabled; that he is a very poor man and in needy circumstances.

Your committee is of the opinion that the said Campbell received his rupture while in the military service of the United States and in the line of duty, in November, 1862, near Jackson, Tenn. Therefore, they recommend that said bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ABIGAIL SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3019) to increase the pension of Abigail Smith.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase the pension now allowed by law to Abigail Smith, widow of the late John E. Smith, deceased, formerly a private in Company G, One hundred and sixtieth Regiment New York Volunteers, from eight to twenty dollars per month.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

That said Abigail Smith is now on the pension-rolls and receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month, as the widow of John E. Smith, late a private in Company G, One hundred and sixtieth Regiment New York Volunteers.

That it appears by the affidavit of George B. Smith and the written statement of Hon. R. S. Stevens, a member of the last Congress, that they are acquainted with Mrs. Smith; that since she was placed on the pension-rolls she has become entirely blind, beyond any possibility of cure; that she is a woman of excellent character, and except from her pension she is dependent upon the charities of others.

The committee are satisfied that this is a meritorious case for an increase of pension, and therefore report that, in their opinion, the said bill should pass, after being amended by striking out the word "twenty" in the last line and inserting the word "twelve" in place thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ELLEN S. TOLMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1152) for the relief Mrs. Ellen S. Tolman.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Ellen S. Tolman, late an army nurse, at the rate of $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) is as follows:

Ellen S. Tolman is one of the corps of noble women who in the early days of the war became interested in the great and holy work of ministering to the sick and wounded of the Union armies. This she did freely, giving of her time as a volunteer nurse, spending her means without thought then of reimbursement by the General Government, nor has she ever asked it, though, beside the time which she gave, she spent several thousands of dollars in prosecuting the work, which she continued from the first Bull Run fight, in 1861, down to February 15, 1863, when she was prostrated by a malarial typhus fever, from the effects of which she never recovered, and which compelled her finally to abandon the work she had so successfully prosecuted. She was a woman of slight build, and in her zeal and enthusiasm worked far beyond her strength, keeping upon her feet until she completely collapsed and broke down. The attack of fever was preceded by convulsions, and for twelve days thereafter all was a blank to her.

Dr. Stanly, of Winthrop, Me., who attended her, then said if she lived until her fever ran its course it would result in consumption or malarial abscesses. The sequel shows that the result was abscesses, from which she has suffered most intensely, having had them on the arm so severe as at one time to suggest amputation as the only means of saving her. Afterward, upon the back, knee, ankle most painful abscesses appeared, which were opened with the knife while she was under the influence of ether. About the 10th of June, 1863, she was able to be removed to her home in Maine, and on August 10, the same year, she was enabled to move painfully around by the use of crutches, and only the last of September was she able to discard them. With returning strength she felt it her duty to again resume her work. She came to Washington, but an attempt to take up the work resulted in complete failure, and she was compelled to again submit to treatment by Dr. Andrews, then at the King street hospital in Alexandria, for a new abscess which formed upon her knee, which finally compelled her to abandon further attempt to aid in the good work so much appreciated by those who had the misfortune to need such ministrations.

In prosecuting this work she had a pass, signed by President Lincoln, authorizing her to enter all hospitals within the Union lines, day or night, and furnishing her with conveyance and escort if necessary.

The evidence submitted is most complete as to the untiring zeal and unflagging spirit with which she labored until, overcome by disease contracted in the work, she was obliged to relinquish further efforts in behalf of our sick and wounded.

Brig. Gen. George L. Beal says, under date of November 14, 1885:

"While I was colonel of the Tenth Maine Regiment I know from personal experience that she gave her entire time in looking after the wants of and seeing that every care and attention was given to those in the hospitals. She became almost indispensable to the officers of my regiment in looking after their men; and any information as to their whereabouts or condition could always be obtained by sending to her. I take great pleasure in recommending her to the kind consideration of our Government, believing its bounties can not be more worthily bestowed than in granting her a pension."

Col. J. W. Hathaway, State agent for Maine, says:

"During my term of office, which ended in the spring of 1863, she continued a devoted and capable assistant in relieving the suffering of our sick and wounded men, until prostrated by serious illness, the result of her charitable work. To the best of my knowledge and belief her labor and sufferings were unremunerated, and I think she is entitled to compensation from the Government."

Hon. Sidney Perham, ex-governor of Maine, says:

"I was in Washington much of the time during the war, and had occasion to know that she spent her time in the interest of the soldier, and that she rendered most efficient service until she was prostrated by a severe fit of sickness attributed to this work. She has been in feeble health ever since. I earnestly hope some provision may be made for her to receive a pension."

Ex-Vice-President Hannibal Hamlin, under date of August 8, 1885, says:

"It was my pleasure to know and to be well acquainted with Mrs. E. B. Tolman. She did a most patriotic and Christian service in the hospitals in and around Washington during the late war. She was a long time in the hospitals; from my recollection more than two years. Her services were well discharged, and, I have understood, all voluntary."

Affidavits are also presented from C. C. Hayes, late "State agent in the field" for Maine, from William K. Neal, of Portland, Me., late paymaster's clerk from 1862 to 1865, as to the great value of her unpaid services; also from soldiers who were nursed by her, one of whom, George F. True, of Auburn, Me., says:

"At the time I was sick in the hospital, from my personal knowledge, I am of opinion that several soldiers' lives were saved by her ministrations, and I know I was greatly indebted to her for my recovery."

She also presents evidence of residents of South Paris, Me., who have known her from childhood, and who testify to her enjoying the best of health previous to her service in Washington in 1861. Also from acquaintances in Lawrence, Mass., where she now resides, showing that since service she has had several attacks of sickness when her life was endangered, and that her health will not allow her to attend to her household duties.

Dr. G. Howard, her family physician, certifies—

"That she suffers from valvular disease of the heart, undoubtedly dependent upon or caused by stenosis of the pulmonary veins. There is also enlargement of liver and spleen, caused undoubtedly by malarial influences contracted while in service in the various hospitals in and about Washington during the late war. She has been a great sufferer for many years from the above causes, and there is no probability that she will ever be any better. The condition of heart is such that exertion of almost any kind causes her much distress and suffering."

Her husband, Eleza B. Tolman, was a private in Company D, Second Maine Volunteers; enlisted April 29, 1861, and was discharged August 8, 1862, for disability contracted in the service resulting in attacks of pleurisy, and any exposure or exertion caused these pains, which centered around the heart, rendering him unfit for any ordinary labor. He never received bounty or applied for pension. They have three children, none of whom are self-supporting. To keep themselves along and fight the wolf they have been forced to sell their farm, and for the past few years have only succeeded in paying expenses by the kindness and liberality of friends.

Your committee are of opinion, where the Government has had the almost (in those days) invaluable services freely and without price, and at the expense of years of physical suffering, as the evidence in this case discloses, of such a noble and devoted woman, there can be no question as to its duty in the premises.

They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHILOMENA E. NOLAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3481) granting a pension to Philomena E. Nolan.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Philomena E. Nolan, of Stoneham, Mass., a disabled daughter of John Nolan, late a private in Company D, Thirty-third Massachusetts Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $18 a month.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire why it is that $18 is fixed as the pension in this case when the usual rule is $12. There may be some reason that I do not know, but I can not see it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I wish to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

Philomena E. Nolan is the daughter of John Nolan, late a private in Company D, Thirty-third Massachusetts Volunteers, who enlisted July 14, 1862, and was killed in battle at Dallas, Ga., May 25, 1864. This girl, at the tender age of sixteen, met with a most terrible accident, which, besides rendering her a helpless invalid for life, also disfigured her in such a shocking manner that even to-day it would make a strong man shudder to gaze upon her deformity. Through the poverty of the family she was forced to become an operative at the age of fourteen years in order to aid in her support. The records of the Massachusetts general hospital, where she was taken for treatment, give the story of the accident and her disfiguration therefrom so fully that the committee quote from it, as follows:

J. K. Phillips, M. D., house officer, under date of December 13, 1885, furnishes the copy of Surgical Records, vols. 154–157:

"Minnie Nolan, æt. 16; occupation, operative; single; duration, five hours; birthplace, Stoneham; residence, Stoneham, Mass. On the 6th of September, 1872, was caught by the hair in machinery and the whole scalp torn off completely from an inch below the occipital protuberance to the bridge of the nose, the ears on both sides escaping, while both upper eyelids were torn off. The scalp was completely detached from the head. When first seen at the hospital the hair had been cut and the scalp reapplied and held in place by sutures. For several days she suffered much pain, requiring repeated opiates.

"September 11, on account of the extensive injury to the part, a sloughing process began on the right side of scalp. Two days later the front portion of the scalp became dead, and the gangrenous parts, from the corners over temporal regions, were removed. Later, lower portions of scalp about neck died, leaving a raw surface extending from ear to ear behind. This sloughing process continued in spite of every precaution, so that on the 26th of September the whole scalp, save a piece the size of a half dollar, had come off the head. Granulations slowly encroached upon the surface of the bone, and repeated attempts at skin-grafting were made, but the condition of the granulations were such as not to permit of successful grafting. The girl's mother became desirous of taking her home, and, inasmuch as it was thought that the country air might improve her general health, she was advised to take her home, with the expectation that if her head improved she should return to try skin-grafting; consequently on September 30 she was discharged, not relieved.

"March 20, 1873, she returned to the hospital in much the same condition as when discharged. After five days, with very slight improvement, she again returned to her home.

"September 23, 1877, the patient returned to hospital. Since her previous entry there had been two thousand five hundred grafts put on her head.

"There was a thin skin over the whole head, which occasionally broke down and ulcerated. In the process of cicatrization both eyelids became turned inside out; that of the left eye more than the right.

"September 25 Dr. J. Collins Warren operated, the patient being etherized. The extreme ectropion of the left eye was relieved. Endeavor was made to transplant a piece of skin from the thigh to the denuded skull. This graft remained in place several days, but sloughed off eventually."

Dr. J. Collins Warren, visiting surgeon Massachusetts general hospital, says of this case, under date of December 16, 1885, quoting from records:

"The accident which happened to this girl is probably one of the most terrible that could occur to a human being, for not only has it entailed upon her incalculable suffering, but has permanently disfigured and disabled her. The condition of the scar is such that the wound is never fully healed, and is liable at any moment to open extensively. She is therefore in a constant state of invalidism, more or less aggravated, which is beyond the resources of our art to relieve.

"An examination made by me December 11, 1885, only confirms these views. After the death of her father the mother remarried, the second husband dying in 1876. The mother, with the aid of friends, has struggled on through these years, until, at the present time, old and poor, she is unable longer to bear these burdens. She must become a charge on charitable institutions or obtain the relief which Congress can grant and on which she feels her child has an equitable claim, by reason of the loss upon the field of battle of him who otherwise might to-day afford that measure of relief so much needed in this season of their great trial and need."

For obvious reasons your committee also take this view of the case, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH SULLIVAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1104) granting a pension to Elizabeth Sullivan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Sullivan, widow of John Sullivan, late a private in Company H, Third Massachusetts Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 1104, submit the following report:

Elizabeth Sullivan is the widow of John Sullivan, late private in Company H, Third Massachusetts Cavalry. The husband of claimant was pensioned for disease of eyes, and at the time of his death, September 20, 1873, was receiving pension at the rate of $24 per month. The widow filed a claim for a pension June 14, 1882, which was rejected June 2, 1884, on the ground that soldier's fatal disease, "erysipelas," did not originate in the service.

The evidence in the case shows that the soldier contracted disease of eyes at Port Hudson, La., in 1863, beginning by being what the soldiers used to call "moon-blind;" that is, in lying with the moon shining in the face while sleeping, the effect was to produce partial or total blindness after dark. The evidence clearly establishes the sequence upon which soldier's pension was based, and was such as to result in total disability, rendering him incapable for any manual labor.

The evidence in support of the widow's claim shows that he suffered from fever and ague as well as disease of eyes, for which pensioned, which finally affected his brain and head, a tumor appearing upon the back of his head, erysipelas ensued, and the soldier died.

Dr. James A. McDonald, of Boston, Mass., testifies "he had known soldier for sixteen years; that he attended him professionally during his last sickness. He was not in full possession of his mental faculties since he left the Army, which he said was caused by moon-stroke, and which prevented him from doing any work since his discharge. Attended him for a tumor on the back of his head, which developed into erysipelas, causing death; that he believed his disability caused the tumor which developed finally into erysipelas, causing death."

W. T. Lemon and James S. Palmer testify:

"Soldier came home nearly blind, gradually grew worse, and that a number of years previous to his death he became a helpless invalid, becoming so bad in his eyes and head that it affected his brain, requiring constant watching and attendance."

Alice Lemon, Elizabeth Palmer, and D. R. Hanmell testify that—

"When the solder came home he was not able to do any work—that he was moon-blind, and out of his head at times."

In this case the presumption is strong that the soldier's death was attributable to the service. He entered the service well and strong, with no disease about him; he came home and was pensioned for disabilities which had weakened his brain and undermined his constitution, which would seem in effect to make him more susceptible to the erysipelas which finally intervened and carried him off.

The widow is seventy-four years old, poor, and unable to care for herself.

Your committee think that in her few remaining days she should have the assistance of the Government, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN H. BARRY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1109) granting a pension to John H. Barry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John H. Barry, late a private in the Thirteenth Massachusetts Battery.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 1109, submit the following report:

John H. Barry enlisted as a private in the Fourth Massachusetts Independent Battery, October 7, 1864, and was afterward transferred to the Thirteenth Massachusetts Light Battery; discharged July 28, 1865. His application for pension was filed April 2, 1879, alleging "disability from rheumatism which became chronic from exposure and hardship." His claim was rejected January 13, 1880, on the ground that there was no record of "alleged rheumatism, and claimant's inability to furnish testimony of surgeon or assistant surgeon showing treatment in service, or medical evidence showing treatment at discharge."

The evidence in the case is as follows:

Lieut. George N. Jenkens, Fourth Massachusetts Battery, certifies claimant joined Fourth Battery at Memphis, Tenn., some time in December, 1864, and that at that time, and while in said battery, he was to all appearance a sound and healthy man, free from all bodily ailments, and remained so until he was transferred, some time in the winter of 1865, to the Thirteenth Massachusetts Battery.

Garrett Lemmons and John W. Hart, of Salem, Mass., certify to knowing claimant from boyhood, and know that at time of enlistment he was a sound, able-bodied man, and apparently free from all disease.

Comrades William A. Silver and John H. Marshall certify that—

"While in service at Greenville, La., in winter of 1864-'65, to our personal knowledge claimant contracted disease of rheumatism, and was incapacitated from duty thereby on several occasions; was sent to brigade hospital, and was confined there because of said disease; that the cause of the disease was the swampy condition of the place where we did duty and the frequent heavy rains at that time; that we have been intimate with claimant since discharge, and have known that he has suffered since then and is at the present time suffering from said disease."

The record of the Fourth Battery is not filed in the office of Surgeon-General.

Surgeon W. W. Hipolite says, in reply to an office letter of November 3, 1882:

"Have no record or recollection of having treated claimant; was in charge of reserve artillery, including Fourth Massachusetts Battery, in January and February, 1865; may or may not have treated him during said time."

David Choat, M. D., Salem, testifies:

"In September, 1866, attended claimant through an acute illness of some two weeks' duration, the nature of which was rheumatism. It is my present impression that I then expressed an opinion that the sickness from which he was then suffering was connected more or less directly with his exposure to malarious influences while in service."

Henry J. Gaffney, M. D., Salem, testifies as follows:

"Attended claimant during months of September, October, December, 1872, and in May, June, September, October, and November, 1873; he was suffering from chronic rheumatism."

The papers in this case show that claimant has almost constantly suffered with the disability for which he claims pension. Since his discharge he has sought relief in change of climate, &c., having visited California; had visited the Grand Banks on a fishing vessel; had been to the hot springs in Gilroy, Colo.; had also on account of his disease been compelled to enter the Soldiers' Home at Milwaukee and while there was compelled for about six months to use crutches; that through his long and permanent sickness he has been at last compelled to enter the National Home at Togus, Me., where he now is for the sake of the advantages it gives for subsistence and treatment.

Drs. Pierson, of Salem, and Drew, of Woburn, Mass., who treated him immediately upon his return from the Army, being dead, he cannot furnish their evidence.

The report of the medical examining board of Boston, Mass., June 25, 1882, is herewith appended:

"General appearance healthy, but all motions in walking are stiff and awkward, as from impairment of motion of hips; no enlargement from joints to be detected, but he complains of much pain in hips, buttocks, and in region of heart; heart's action normal, though its sounds are not very clear. He states he has been kept from work three-fourths of the time the past year on account of rheumatism. If of Army origin and from our examination we should rate 'total,' but collateral testimony may warrant higher rating."

In view of all the facts in this case your committee are of opinion that this claimant has a strong claim upon the Government for relief, and they do therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN TAYLOR WOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5198) to remove the disabilities of John Taylor Wood, of Louisiana.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all disabilities imposed upon and incurred by John Taylor Wood, of Louisiana, under and by virtue of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, be, and are hereby, removed.

The report (by Mr. TUCKER) is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which has been referred the petition of John Taylor Wood, respectfully report a bill for the removal of his disabilities under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, and recommend its passage.

The petition is herewith returned.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SUSANNAH CARMICHAEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3902) for the relief of Susannah Carmichael.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susannah Carmichael, widow of John W. Carmichael, deceased, late captain of Company C, Ninety-seventh Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3902) for the relief of Susannah Carmichael, having considered the same, report as follows:

Claimant's husband, Capt. John W. Carmichael, enlisted as captain of Company C, Ninety-seventh Indiana Volunteers, August 16, 1862; was discharged from service May 1, 1863; applied for and was granted a pension for chronic diarrhea contracted at Holly Springs, Miss., while in line of duty; subsequently granted arrears for same disability.

The soldier died in 1877, the widow's claim for pension being rejected by the Pension Office upon the evidence by Drs. McDowell and Woodward to a special examiner, these physicians stating that soldier did not die of chronic diarrhea, as sworn to by them in former affidavits, but of malarial poisoning contracted while in the Army.

However, these physicians subsequently changed the statements in their second affidavits, making the statements contained in their first affidavits that Captain Carmichael died of chronic diarrhea, having incurred said disability while in line of duty.

The Pension Department, however, holding it could not be granted by the subsequent statements by Drs. McDowell and Woodward, rejected the claim.

A careful examination of the voluminous evidence clearly establishes the following facts: Fifteen of his comrades, members of his company, and former neighbors, testified that the soldier was sound and free from disease upon entering the service, and that he contracted chronic diarrhea while in line of duty at Holly Springs, Miss.

Drs. Grary, Woodward, McDowell, Meredith, Norval, and Minick state in their affidavits that Captain Carmichael died from chronic diarrhea contracted in the Army.

Surgeon Murphy certifies:

"I carefully examined Captain Carmichael and find him unable for military duty by reason of chronic diarrhea and disease of left knee, and I recommend his discharge from service to save his life." (Report from Adjutant-General's Office, January 23, 1863.)

Your committee, holding the evidence in claimant's favor conclusive, report the bill favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

TAYLOR VOSS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3903) granting a pension to Taylor Voss.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Taylor Voss, late a private in Companies I and G, Eleventh Regiment Kentucky Cavalry, said pension to commence from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 3903, having considered the same, report as follows:

This soldier enlisted in Company I, Eleventh Kentucky Cavalry, September 12, 1862, was captured on a raid from Carthage to Gallatin, Tenn., December, 1862, and taken to Liberty; thence to McMinnville; thence to Tullahoma, Tenn.; was paroled March 19, 1863; joined his regiment at Camp Nelson, Ky., August, 1863. He was again taken prisoner by General Wheeler at Philadelphia, Tenn., October 20, 1863; was taken to Athens, Tenn.; then to Dalton, Ga.; thence to Belle Isle, near Richmond, Va., remaining there until March, 1864; transferred thence to Andersonville, his condition then being one of extreme suffering, and almost starvation, until September, 1864; then removed to Charleston, S. C., and placed in a parole hospital, remaining there six weeks. He was then sent to Florence, S. C., where he was exchanged and sent to a hospital at Camp Chase, Ohio, where he remained until April, 1865.

The claimant contracted rheumatism in prison at Belle Isle from exposure to cold and dampness, which was grievously aggravated from exposure to cold rains at Andersonville, from which he has constantly suffered ever since. Claimant was treated by Dr. Longwell at Camp Chase, Ohio, said physician dying soon afterward. The claimant was also treated for rheumatism from 1866 to 1868 by Dr. Matthew Pyle, of Louisville, Ky., who died in 1870.

This claim was rejected at the Pension Office in April, 1885, on account of the inability of the claimant to prove by the records of the War Department incurrence of disability while a prisoner of war.

In view of claimant's long imprisonment and extreme sufferings and the inability to furnish evidence called for by the Department caused by the death of the physician who treated him, and the death of comrades who were fellow-sufferers in prison, the evidence clearly showing him to be a sufferer from rheumatism continually since his discharge, and the medical board at Mitchell, Ind., having examined him in January, 1885, and given him a total rating for disability, caused by rheumatism, as they believed, to have been incurred while a prisoner of war, your committee, being entirely convinced that this claim is just, report the bill favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM P. SQUIRES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4581) granting an increase of pension to William P. Squires.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That William P. Squires, late of Company C, Seventy-fifth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, now receiving a pension of $30 per month for loss of leg, and who, on account of gunshot wound in right hand received in the service of the United States, in said Seventy-fifth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, is rendered practically helpless so far as his being able to earn a livelihood, shall receive in lieu thereof, and there shall be paid to him in the same manner as he is now paid the sum of $30 per month, the sum of $50 per month, the increase herein provided for to take effect from the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the said William P. Squires shall be paid the difference between $50 per month and that already received by him from the 1st day of July, 1880, to the time of the taking effect of this act.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the following amendments:

In line 11, strike out "$50" and insert "$36."

Strike out section 2 of the bill.

The amendments were agreed to.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4581) granting an increase of pension to William P. Squires, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted August 9, 1862, and was discharged March 6, 1865; that he received a gunshot wound in his hand at the battle of Stone River, and afterward at Lovejoy Station he was wounded in the left leg, making necessary an amputation of that limb. Gangrene set in, rendering it necessary to perform three subsequent amputations. He is now receiving the pension allowed for the loss of that limb. The man refused to receive the discharge offered him after his first wound, and bravely continued in the service.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out the word "fifty" in the twelfth line and inserting the words "thirty-six," and striking out the second section of the bill.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHILIP WAGNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3399) to grant a pension to Philip Wagner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Philip Wagner, late of the Second Ohio Heavy Artillery.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3399) to grant a pension to Philip Wagner, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted November 13, 1861, and was discharged December 8, 1862; that he afterward enlisted June 5, 1863, and served until August 23, 1865. His first service being in Eighth Independent Ohio Battery, and his subsequent service in Second Ohio Heavy Artillery. November, 1863, he applied for a pension, alleging chronic diarrhea, resulting in piles and kidney disease, contracted at Pittsburg Landing, May, 1862. This was rejected on the ground that he could not prove existence of disability at discharge, or for several years thereafter.

Claimant says:

"I was a green German when I enlisted; had been only three days in America. My knowledge of the English language was so limited I could not make my wants and wishes known."

The hospital records show that he was sick July and August, 1862—disability not stated—and that he was in hospital at Memphis, sick, November and December, 1862. His first discharge from service was in consequence of "repeated attacks of hemoptysis, which will lead to pulmonary consumption." The hospital record also shows that he had typhoid fever during June, 1862.

Capt. J. F. Putnam, of the Eighth Independent Ohio Battery, testifies that—

"He thinks claimant sound at enlistment, as evidenced from his performance of duty in the battery until about the 1st of May, 1862, when he was attacked with diarrhea, complicated with piles and kidney trouble; was sent to field hospital; rejoined the regiment in the summer, but remained but a short time, his disease unfitting him for duty, and he was again sent to hospital. I was acting as orderly sergeant and made out his papers."

Charles H. Schmidt says he knew claimant at enlistment; that he was to all appearances stout and healthy, and that he was taken sick just after the battle of Pittsburgh Landing. Adolph Schmidt testifies to the same state of facts, and adds he was the "picture of health when he enlisted." H. P. Lotee testifies that his condition since 1871 has been one of sickness from chronic diarrhea, kidney troubles, and piles. Robert F. Adams testifies to the same.

Drs. J. Morgan and J. L. Jones treated him from 1877 until 1884 for the same diseases; that he gradually grew worse, and had to give up work entirely.

The examining board at Independence, Kans., January 30, 1884, report:

"That he is disabled from manual labor; heart's action weak, rapid, and irritable; his disability is equal to a loss of a hand or foot. Entitled to a total third grade."

The evidence of the continuance of the disability from 1865 to 1870 is lacking. Claimant testifies that during all of that time he was traveling around and working as a journeyman tailor; that he employed no physician, but bought medicines; that he was never free from the disease, though he was better after his discharge than when he left the service. He also says that in 1867 he employed a man in Indiana to get him a pension; that he paid the man $75 upon his statement that he would have to go to Washington to look after it for him, and he supposed, until informed to the contrary, that he had an application for a pension on file. The evidence in the case seems to establish the origin of the diseases in the service, and the evidence of continuance since 1871 is clearly shown, as is also the fact that he is entirely disabled now.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS G. BARTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5199) to increase the pension of Thomas G. Barton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Thomas G. Barton, and pay him at the rate of $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 776) to increase the pension of Thomas G. Barton, submit the following report:

We find that claimant was a private in Company C, Thirty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and that in 1871 he applied for a pension on account of epilepsy. The evidence in the case was very strong, and pension was granted in 1872, and he was allowed $4 per month, which was afterward increased to $8, the sum he is now receiving.

In April, 1870, while living near Williamsburg, in Franklin County, Kansas, a prairie fire broke out, threatening the destruction of his home. In trying to put it out he fell in a fit, and before he could be rescued he was so badly burned that it became necessary to amputate his left arm and a part of his right hand. The family are poor, and to add to his misfortunes his wife has entirely lost the sight of one eye and partially that of the other, rendering her unable to assist in the support of the family.

Rev. W. W. Curtis says of the claimant: "He is a moral, temperate, Christian gentleman and a deserving citizen."

The connection between his present disability and that for which he is pensioned is very close, but not being a necessary result the Department can not grant the relief they otherwise would. That his terrible misfortune is the result of the disability contracted in the service is beyond doubt; nor could he be charged with negligence in exposing himself to the fire, knowing his condition, when it is taken into consideration that he was striving to save his little home from destruction.

Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SIMMONS W. HARDEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Simmons W. Harden, late a private in Company L, First Regiment of Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1406) granting a pension to Simmons W. Harden, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted in Company L, First Iowa Cavalry, December 20, 1863, and was discharged May 17, 1865. His application for pension was filed July, 1866, and a subsequent declaration was filed June 18, 1880. His claim was rejected on the ground that disease of the heart existed before enlistment.

Dr. D. C. Hastings testifies that he was his family physician from 1855 to 1863, and that he was sound at the time of enlistment. Four other parties claiming to know him intimately swear that he was an able-bodied, sound man at enlistment.

Lieutenant Simeral, first lieutenant of the company, says that at Little Rock, Ark., his company was ordered for a general review, dismounted, and had to march two miles on double quick. The heat of the day being great, claimant was overcome with heat, injuring him so he was unfit for duty thereafter. William T. Wallace testifies to the same state of facts, and that he was sent to hospital. D. S. Levastrel says that he positively knows that claimant, after the two miles run, fell in a fit; that he and another comrade caught him as he was falling; that he was taken to the hospital, and was thereafter unfit for any duty.

Drs. D. C. Hastings and E. M. Wilson testify that they have known claimant ever since discharge, and that he was suffering with heart disease in 1865, immediately after discharge, the latter testifying that he treated him for eight years. Seven other witnesses, reported reputable, testify to his condition since. There appears to be no question as to his disability from time of discharge until the present time. Two special examiners investigated the case, one recommending that the case be rejected and the other declaring that it was meritorious. Several witnesses testify that they thought he had heart disease before enlistment; others that he had no heart disease at time of discharge. The evidence also shows that at Davenport, Iowa, March, 1864, while standing on the hub of a wagon drawing water for the company, he fell, injuring his right side seriously, caused by ice forming on the wheel.

The medical examination shows:

"This claimant's heart beats at times very violently, and after a time it sinks to a feeble pulsation. At the time the excited action declines the claimant has vertigo, and feels prostrate for an hour or more."

Claimant is now seventy years of age, and dependent on his labor for support.

Hon. A. J. WEAVER, a member of this House, testifies to the high character of claimant.

The only question in the case is as to his condition at time of his enlistment, and the evidence is so flatly contradictory on that point that it is impossible to decide that question. One witness testifies that he enlisted at the same time; that both were stripped, carefully examined, and accepted. He served eighteen months, and until he received his injury there is no record or evidence that he was in any way disabled.

The case is a strong one, with the exception of the doubt as to his soundness at time of enlistment. Your committee, believing that the old soldier should have the benefit of the doubt, recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

REBECCA ELDRIDGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2145) for the relief of Rebecca Eldridge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to have the name of Rebecca Eldridge, as widow of Wilber H. Eldridge, late of Company G, First Maine Heavy Artillery, placed on the pension-roll at the rate $8 per month, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2145) for the relief of Rebecca Eldridge, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to make the following report:

Wilbur H. Eldridge was enrolled July 24, 1862, in Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Maine Infantry Volunteers. On the muster-rolls of that regiment, from its organization, he is reported "present for duty" until month to date, June 21, 1865, at Whitehall General Hospital, Philadelphia. Company and regimental records on file indicate that he "was wounded in action at Hatcher's Run, Virginia, March 25, 1865, slight in leg."

Dr. Frederick R. Swazey, examining surgeon, under date of March 19, 1865, testifies that he examined this soldier, who was an applicant for a pension, and that in his opinion he was one-half incapacitated from obtaining his living by manual labor by reason of a gunshot wound in left leg; and also stated, as the result of that examination, that the disability was "probably not permanent." Applicant was wounded five inches below the knee, from which wound he is slightly lame and suffers considerable pain.

Dr. T. Cooley, examining surgeon, who again, April 21, 1880, examined this claimant, stated that in his opinion he was not incapacitated from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor. "A careful examination disclosed a wound of calf of left leg at about or a little below its middle, the ball passing rather superficially through the muscles; could see both the entrance and exit of the ball, but no adherent integuments. The leg is of the same size of the right: no lameness, he says, unless after long standing or walking a good deal. His health looks pretty fair."

Charles H. Lester, M. D., testifies that he attended Wilbur H. Eldridge January 27 or 28, 1881. Found him with fracture at base of skull caused by falling backwards from a ladder while working on a building in Kansas City, Mo., and that he died from that injury at 12 p. m. the same night.

His widow's claim for a pension was rejected on the ground that her husband's death was "not the result of his Army service, but came from a fall since leaving the service."

The question for your committee to decide is whether the wound received by claimant's husband in the calf of his leg in March, 1865, was the cause of his losing his life by falling from a ladder on which he was working January 27, 1881. A careful examination of the evidence on file in the Pension Department has revealed no other history of this case during the intervening period. It leaves him with a superficial gunshot wound through the muscles of the leg, a little below the middle, with nothing to indicate it but the cicatrices at the entrance and exit of the ball—no swelling of the leg nor any lameness, unless after long standing; and takes him up again, after an interval of sixteen years, at work from a ladder on a building, from which he falls backwards, fracturing his skull.

It is impossible to properly estimate the influence which the slightest circumstances may have in bringing about a fall from a precarious position such as this man occupied at the time of his fall. It may, however, be possible that it came from a sudden giving way of the wounded leg which precipitated him from the ladder and caused his death. He had for years been an applicant for a pension, and thus indicated the nature of the disability from which he alleged he was a sufferer; but, yielding to the necessity for procuring a living for his wife and family, he engaged in labor for which he was disqualified by the consequences of his wound and lost his life indirectly through the effort.

Considering that this soldier's record was a good one, showing three years of continuous service; that he received a wound in battle, and considering the other circumstances of this case, together with the distressed and impoverished condition of his widow, your committee recommend that the relief asked for be granted, and that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL T. FERGUSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 844) granting a pension to Daniel T. Ferguson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Daniel T. Ferguson, late of Company K, Fifth Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 844) granting a pension to Daniel T. Ferguson, having carefully considered the same, submit the following report:

Daniel T. Ferguson enlisted as private in Company K, Fifth Kentucky Cavalry, on January 1, 1862, and honorably discharged May 3, 1865; filed application for pension on March 10, 1873, which was rejected September 1, 1884, on the ground that there is no record of alleged dropsy and disease of lungs, and claimant's declared inability to furnish evidence of an officer as to origin or regimental surgeon as to treatment in the service or medical testimony six months subsequent to discharge. He bases his claim on dropsy and lung disease resulting from measles contracted and hardship and exposure suffered while in service and in line of duty on and about March, 1864.

Regimental hospital records are not on file in War Department. Records of General Hospital No. 1 at Nashville, Tenn., show him in same at time stated suffering with measles. He proves by a number of reputable comrades that he contracted measles while in service and line of duty at time stated, and that said disease resulted in disease of lungs, from which he has never recovered. He also proves by his family physician that he was sound and free from disease when he entered said service, and that he has suffered from dropsy ever since 1865 as a result of his service.

Your committee are of opinion that said soldier contracted dropsy and disease of lungs while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, from which he has never recovered. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH J. PRATER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3990) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Sarah J. Prater.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah J. Prater, widow of William Prater, deceased, late of Company I, Fourteenth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the bill with the following amendment:

At the end of the bill add the following:

"The pension to date from the 9th day of September, 1878."

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. 3990) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Sarah Jane Prater, widow of W. W. Prater, late a sergeant of Company I, Fourteenth Kentucky Volunteers, having carefully considered the same, submit the following report:

William W. Prater enlisted as sergeant in Company I, Fourteenth Kentucky Volunteers, November 10, 1861, and was discharged for disability April 18, 1863, and died shortly afterward.

Sarah Jane Prater, his surviving widow, was granted a pension on 20th day of May, 1868, which was discontinued on the 9th day of September, 1878, on the report of a special examiner of the Pension Office, showing that the soldier was afflicted with rheumatism before he entered the service, and on the presumption that the soldier's death was not attributable to his service in the Army.

The proof by affidavits of his family physicians shows that the soldier was afflicted with rheumatism and had an attack of remittent fever "several years before his enlistment," but that he had entirely recovered therefrom before his enlistment, and that he was in very bad health when he returned from the Army with rheumatism, and continued to grow worse until he died. His long and faithful service in the Army and his stout and robust condition at enlistment and his severe affliction when he returned from the service strongly corroborate the otherwise abundant proof that said soldier contracted the disease from which he died while in the service and in the line of duty.

The certificate of the examining regimental surgeon on which his discharge was granted shows that his said disease was contracted after his enlistment, and had only existed for about twelve months prior to discharge.

The special examiners on whose report the name of the widow was stricken from pension-roll declined to examine the captain of said soldier's company, although visiting the neighborhood in which he resided, saying that he was not reliable, when, in fact, he stands highly indorsed in the record for truth and veracity, and is highly indorsed by many prominent men in his neighborhood, and no reflection is cast on his character anywhere in the record, save by the special examiner. He also declined to examine or interview claimant, although visiting the neighborhood of her residence.

The examination was private and ex parte.

The report on which the special examination was based was made by one McDowell, who in his letter of information makes a request for employment and authority to examine the case, evidently hoping to make himself some money at the expense of a meritorious widow, and for the further purpose of appearing loyal to the interests of the Department, when he was at the time engaged in defrauding both the United States Treasury and claimants, as the records of the Pension Office show.

From all the facts in the record, your committee is of opinion that the special examiner went into the investigation with the full intention to bring about the discontinuance of the pension, and fell into the hands of the enemies of the pensioner, who succeeded in aiding him in the accomplishment of that object.

Your committee strongly recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendment: Add the words, "pension to date from the 9th day of September, 1878."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the committee.

Mr. FUNSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passing of this bill, and I beg the indulgence of the House for a few moments only to reply to the remarks made on last pension night by the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

I know how precious the moments are to those of us who are desirous of passing the bills which have been assigned to this special night, and I shall make my remarks so brief that no one can accuse me of consuming much time.

We can not afford to pass by the gentleman's remarks in silence. We would be unjust to ourselves were we not to admit that they were ably and, I may say, skillfully made; and, in my opinion, they demand a reply, else our silence may be taken as an acknowledgment that his positions and conclusions are right, and that we are guilty of the greatest wrong to the people in our efforts to be liberal in our treatment of the nation's defenders.

The gentleman views the whole question from a very narrow standpoint. He lays down as political axioms what are only assertions. He draws conclusions which are directly contrary to existing facts. His narrow standpoint consists in his failure to realize the late rebellion was anything more than a war between the States; that expression of itself conveying the idea of a general and indiscriminate family fight among the States, in which it was hard to tell which was wrong and which was right. He fails also to realize that our nation's defenders made anything more than the ordinary sacrifice which is common to the life of all soldiers, and that they endured hardships and dangers so long with no other incentive than a patriotic determination to save the life of the nation, and that that great army which has long ago melted away into civil life was drawn, not from professional soldiers inured to camp and change of climate, but from men in every vocation—the very change from which into the life and vocation of the soldier means death and disease to a large extent.

The gentleman must get up higher and hunt a broader plane from which to view the facts before he can be able to place a limit to our debt, not only of gratitude but of substantial aid, to the men who so unselfishly strove through long years of hardships and dangers that the gentleman from Georgia and others from the rebellious States might sit in the councils of the nation as they do to-day and enjoy the proud satisfaction of realizing that they are the representatives of the freest, the happiest, and the most powerful people on the face of the earth.

Could he get up to that broader plane he would behold a young Republic, carrying in her hands the destinies of the great principles laid down by the father of his party, making her first struggle for the preservation of her life. He would behold her thousands of homes stripped of their sons and fathers, who were turned into the field against an enemy armed and equipped with the very guns and accouterments which were intended for her own defense; against an enemy but little less than they in numerical strength, who were posted amid high mountains and deep rivers and dense forests. He would see them hurled against fortifications and rifle-pits, or camped amid the deadly miasma of the cypress swamps.

He would see them at the end of four years return to their homes, give up their arms, and seek their various vocations, many whose health was broken disdaining a pension as in the light of charity, but who in after years found themselves in their unequal struggle for the things of this world forced to enter the shadows of old age in poverty; and then for the first time it was forced on their conviction that they would have to ask the great nation which had in those trying days leaned so confidently on their strong arms now that reciprocation which the highest impulses of our nature declare to be due the unfortunate benefactor in all parts of the world and in all ages.

The gentleman from Georgia seems not to differ in his opinions with many of us on this floor as to the debt of gratitude which we owe the soldiers, but he has an aversion to paying debts of gratitude in dollars and cents. That seems to be the sticking point with him. I presume he would not object to us taking off our hats and bowing low to those broken-down veterans or to our inflicting upon them long speeches on every possible occasion, but he is not willing to go down into the nation's great wealth to place them on a footing with what they would have been had they not sacrificed their health and their best days in the defense of the Government.

He would pay them, I presume, in expressions of gratitude unalloyed with the filthy lucre for which other men struggle so hard. That is a high-toned way of doing business, but it is chill comfort for the old soldier whose health and youth are gone and want stares him in the face. As an excuse for the proffered payment in cheap expressions of gratitude, he says, "The country should not be bankrupted to pay the soldiers pensions," and then proceeds to show the amount of money which would have to come out of the pockets of the people, and declares that for every dollar that goes into the Treasury a like dollar comes out of their pockets.

I admit, Mr. Chairman, the latter part of this statement to be true only so far as relates to the money raised by the system of internal revenue which is mainly on whisky and tobacco, but affecting those only who manufacture, handle, or use them.

It is too late in the age, Mr. Chairman, to arouse any great degree of sympathy with them. We may pity the man who has doomed himself to be the slave of a filthy and useless weed, but we can not regard his complaints as a cry coming up from the great body of the tax-ridden people of whom the gentleman speaks in such touching terms.

And as for the tax on whisky, I have no hesitancy in saying, give us a little more of that kind of tax. I say tax the man who makes it, tax the man who sells it, tax the man who drinks it; tax and keep taxing whisky, the man, and all, if necessary for the suppression of this great curse. And I am led to believe, from recent developments that the people of Georgia would be the first to respond "amen;" at least there would be no cry of tax-ridden distress come up from that direction.

The only other great source from which the revenues of the country are raised, and which I infer he calls a tax on the people, are the duties levied on foreign imports, and which he admitted to be no tax when he declared "that there has perhaps been no time in the history of the country when $8 would buy more of the necessaries of life than it would buy to-day." If that is what he calls a tax, I say give us a little more of that kind of tax, until the poor man who spends his hard-earned wages for the necessaries of life may be able to clothe himself and family as comfortably as the richest in the land.

The facts are, Mr. Chairman, that we stand in fortunate business relations to the balance of the world, deriving an annual income of about $200,000,000 from customs, which are but little, if any, tax to the American people when considered in connection with the benefits to all classes arising from the system of protection. And I dare say that not one man in Georgia, rich or poor, at the end of the year when his balances are made as between his sales and purchases, has paid a nickel into the fund that pays the soldiers' pensions, unless he uses tobacco, whisky, or runs a national bank.

I say the gentleman needs to get up higher and to take a broader view of the surroundings, and he will behold that what he and others upon this floor have chosen to call taxes on the people are in many cases no more of a tax on them than are the profits of their respective business pursuits a tax on their families. One of the great questions for us to solve is how best to apply the proceeds of the management of the National Government. Shall it be solely in paying members of Congress, Government officers, and the national debt, or shall we take in also the nation's defenders, who were paid in a half-worthless currency and are shut out from arrears of pensions because they did not apply before a certain date? Justice, Mr. Chairman, demands that we should do the latter.

A proper regard for our own safety in the future demands that we in the days of peace and prosperity should stand by the helpless men who stood so firmly by the Government in her hour of peril. Do so, Mr. Chairman, and we will need no standing army. Let it be known that the Republic guarantees to each of her citizens who bears arms in her defense a competency in case he becomes disabled from any cause whatever, and the millions of dollars which we may some day be compelled to spend for the support of a standing army can be applied to building up the arts of peace.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WINANS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RICHARDSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had instructed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

ADDIE L. MACOMBER.

A bill (H. R. 1462) granting a pension to Addie L. Macomber was reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with an amendment, reducing the proposed pension from $25 per month to $12 per month.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I think that if the report in this case had been heard the Committee of the Whole would not have agreed to the amendment. This is a bill to pension a nurse for services rendered in caring for the wounded soldiers of the Union Army during the war. I read a few lines from the report. The committee say:

> The papers filed with the committee show long and almost continuous service and faithful performance of duty which endeared her to those under her charge, and present physical infirmities and weakness of a serious character, attributed to her labors in the hospitals.

The bill as presented would give this woman $25 per month. The amendment proposes to strike out $25 and insert $12. We have passed to-night, in Committee of the Whole, a bill granting a pension for similar services at the rate of $25 per month. I see no reason for making any difference between the two cases. A few evenings since, I believe, we passed a bill granting a pension to a nurse at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. PETERS. Thirty dollars.

Mr. MORRILL. Twenty-five dollars.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The pension in that case was granted for arduous and faithful service of this character. Now, why should not the bill pass in its original form? I am unused to the ways of legislation, and I do not know exactly what motion to make; but I earnestly think that if the House has the power now to disagree to the amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole it ought to do so.

Mr. WINANS. I think there is an important difference between this case and the one to which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] has referred. If my recollection serves me aright, this is the case of a nurse who performed duty in a city and who received pay for her services. The other was the case of a volunteer nurse, who, without compensation for her services, went into the field to care for the sick and wounded soldiers in the various hospitals. The lady whom this bill proposes to pension was employed as a nurse in the city of Baltimore or Philadelphia—never left the city hospital—and was paid for her services. There is quite a distinction between the case of a volunteer nurse who attends sick and wounded soldiers in the field and a nurse regularly employed and paid, who renders duty in a city hospital.

Mr. MORRILL. In addition to what has just been said by my friend from Michigan [Mr. WINANS], I wish to state that these two cases were very carefully examined by the committee. The evidence in the present case showed, as my friend from Michigan has said, that the lady was paid for her services. In the other case the evidence showed that the lady abandoned a lucrative business—a school which was paying her $100 a month; that she was attacked by small-pox while nursing soldiers in the hospital, and suffered terribly from the disease; that after her recovery she returned to her duties at the hospital, and for these services she never received anything.

Mr. PETERS. How much did the bill reported by the committee give her?

Mr. MORRILL. Twenty-five dollars a month.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 15, noes 5.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINANS moved to reconsider the several votes by which the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. WINANS (at 9 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 13, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, death has added another name to the catalogue of our eminent historic dead, and a man of patriotic devotion, who has served the State and honored every station to which he has been called, has passed, in the fullness of years, to the great majority.

Grant, we beseech Thee, Almighty God, that the solemn lessons of the shortness and uncertainty of our life may inspire us to emulate the example of the noble dead that have gone before us, that every man shall serve his country and his God in reverence and fidelity, and so at last bring us all to the general assembly and church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven, we humbly pray, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIGHT-HOUSE, GRAY'S HARBOR, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting letters from the Light-House Board, asking an additional appropriation for a light-house at the entrance of Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SALARIES, REGISTER'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, referring to estimates of appropriations "for salaries in the office of the Register," and submitting additional estimates of appropriations for the office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS BY SEA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an amendment to House bill 5286, a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea;" which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information as to whether the eight-hour law is being enforced by the Post-Office Department in respect to letter-carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Labor and ordered to be printed.

POULSON & EGER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a report from William J. Fryar upon the claim of Poulson & Eger, of New York, and recommending an appropriation of $827.18 for the payment thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents for the calendar year ending December 31, 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CATHERINE C. B. MORRILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Quartermaster-General of the Army upon the claim of Catherine C. B. Morrill, executrix of P. Morrill, deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER, in accordance with the rule, laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were read a first and second time, and severally referred, as follows:

A bill (S. 150) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 223) to regulate the promotion of graduates of the United States Military Academy—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 269) for the relief of W. H. Powell—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 390) for the relief of H. A. Myers—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 391) for the relief of A. A. Thomas—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 574) for the relief of Robert Strachan—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 699) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue to George K. Otis duplicates of certain land-warrants lost while in the possession of the officers of the Government—to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF SENATE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ORDNANCE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, providing for the printing of 11,100 additional copies of the report of the Senate Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a Senate concurrent resolution of the 11th instant, providing for the printing of 3,000 copies of the report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the table the bill (H. R. 2022) to increase the pension of Ellen M. Mitchell, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with adverse recommendation, and have the same placed upon the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the request of the gentleman will be granted.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the table, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the adverse report, ordered to be printed.

FUNDS SEIZED BY UNITED STATES OFFICERS, LOUISIANA.

Mr. GEDDES. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on War Claims to report back a resolution which was referred to that committee and recommend its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 8, 1886.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to furnish to this House a statement of all moneys or funds seized and collected by Generals B. F. Butler and N. P. Banks, or on their order, while in command of the Department of the Gulf during the late civil war, and particularly of all amounts seized or collected under General Banks's order No. 202, by officers or authorities of the United States in New Orleans during the period from May 1, 1862, to May 1, 1865, together with the disposition of the said moneys and funds so seized and appropriated by the United States.

The Committee on War Claims have considered the said resolution, and recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to inquire if that resolution was introduced in the House and referred to the committee.

Mr. GEDDES. If the gentleman addresses his question to me, I am not able to hear his inquiry.

Mr. BURROWS. I inquired if this matter had been introduced in the House and referred to the committee.

Mr. GEDDES. It was, and was acted upon in the committee, which recommend the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. GEDDES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

Mr. PAYSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 640) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SENATE ELECTION CASES.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound 3,050 additional copies of the Compilation of Senate Election Cases, 1789-1885; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 50 copies for the compiler of the work."

The estimated cost of the additional copies as above is $1,341.27.

The committee report it back to the House and recommend its passage.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEDICAL AND SURGICAL HISTORY OF THE REBELLION.

Mr. BARKSDALE, from the Committee on Printing, also submitted the following report:

The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following House resolution of January 6, 1886, have had the same under consideration, and instruct me to report it back and recommend its passage:

"Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, directed to inform the House,

"First. What, if any, progress has been made toward printing a new edition or new editions of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion under existing legislation in that behalf, and when, if ever, in his opinion, such edition or editions thereunder may be reasonably expected.

"Second. What would be the probable cost to the Government of issuing a revised edition, not materially more expensive than the original one, of 5,000 of said work; what of 10,000?

"Third. Whether the plates used in printing said work are preserved and in condition for further use."

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this resolution under what provision of law a new edition of that work is to be issued? I understand the resolution refers to a revision now in progress.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. What revision?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I will send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Public Printer, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, which perhaps contains the information the gentleman desires.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st instant regarding the resolution introduced by Hon. JOHN LITTLE.

In answer thereto I beg to say that nothing has been done as to printing a new edition of the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion under existing legislation. The act referred to does not meet the case, as the illustrations for a small edition are so expensive that it brings the price up to a figure regarded by the public as out of all reason.

The best way, in the judgment of the Public Printer, on account of the many lithographs, is to make a specific order for not less than 5,000 copies, to be sold at cost.

The estimated cost of 5,000 copies each of the five volumes is $45,590. Ten thousand copies would cost double that sum. This estimate does not include the lithographing.

It is thought that the cost of lithographing will be about as follows:

On an edition of 500, $10 per volume.
On an edition of 1,000, $6 per volume.
On an edition of 5,000, $1.50 per volume.
On an edition of 10,000, $1 per volume.

The cost of printing and binding, about $1.85 per volume, which would make the total cost per volume about as follows:

On an edition of 500, $11.85 per volume.
On an edition of 1,000, $7.85 per volume.
On an edition of 5,000, $3.35 per volume.
On an edition of 10,000, $2.85 per volume.

The stereotype plates for the work are in the possession of this office. Should there be a reprint there will be no expense for composition.

Very respectfully,
In the absence of the Public Printer,
CADET TAYLOR, Chief Clerk.

Hon. ETHELBERT BARKSDALE,
Chairman Committee on Printing.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to know whether this contemplates a revision of that work. I had the idea the work was exceedingly valuable when published, and would be exceedingly valuable now, provided it was revised. I am advised by the surgeons of my district that there are some parts of that work which were extremely valuable in its time, which have now become antiquated. If this provides for a revision I am heartily for it, because I consider it the most valuable work published in a generation, if it could be revised, but my impression was it was merely a reprint. I understand it is a revision of that work, and the edition amounts to—how many? Five thousand?

Mr. BARKSDALE. This resolution does not authorize any, but it is simply a resolution of inquiry.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL FORCE DOCUMENT-ROOM.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 15, 1886.

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be authorized to employ three additional assistants in the House document-room, at a salary of $800 each per year, during the remainder of this Congress; and three additional laborers, at $60 each per month, during the remainder of this Congress, all of whom shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The Committee on Accounts, to which this resolution was referred, have given the matter careful consideration, and from information obtained from employés now in the document-room conclude an increase in the force is necessary, although not to the extent indicated in the resolution. The committee therefore report the following substitute, and recommend its adoption:

"Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be authorized to employ two additional assistant file clerks in the House document-room, at a salary of $800 each per year during the remainder of this Congress, and one additional laborer, at $60 per month, during the remainder of this Congress, all of whom shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, the permanent force in the document-room is the same as it has been for a long period of time, including a number of past Congresses. There are five in number, including an assistant doorkeeper, Colonel Bacon, who was appointed by special resolution of the House, and has continued ever since. It has been found, however, during the past Congress, that after careful inquiry this force has been insufficient for the transaction of the business of that document-room.

Consequently there has been in each Congress a detail made of special employés, taken sometimes from other rolls and sometimes provided expressly for this employment, for assistance in carrying on the work that is required in that room. Of course, with the increase of number in the membership of this House and the large increase in the number of bills and documents which go to the document-room, the laborers in the document-room have constantly been increased during past Congresses, and their number is larger, as your committee believes, in this Congress than it has been before.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], upon a resolution that was introduced in the House and recommended by the Committee on Accounts recently for the employment of an additional assistant in the seal-room of the House, objected strongly to the naming of the person to be employed, although your committee thought at that time it was desirable to name the party who was to be employed, because that party was one who was familiar with the duties to be performed, and had given good service in the position theretofore. I refer to this simply for the purpose of saying that perhaps the Committee on Accounts might have taken the liberty to have named in this resolution the additional employés who are to be employed if the objection had not been taken in the other case and the resolution changed in that respect by the vote of the House.

The situation now in the document-room is that, besides the five regular employés who are on the permanent roll, there are three employés who are on other rolls, and also three employés who are working there without pay; one of them as a laborer without pay, I should say, from the Government; one of them being a laborer who is paid by the employés there themselves for assistance out of their own salaries, and two who are not on any roll at all, but are serving as volunteers. Of those who are thus employed, making in the aggregate six over the permanent force on the roll in the document-room, one named Whitely is on the Doorkeeper's roll and is detailed in the document-room. He is a skilled employé, who is familiar with the duties required of him in the document-room. The two volunteers who are now laboring there are also skilled in the same employment. They are named Isham and Mallory.

Your committee in reporting the substitute resolution believe they provide for a reasonably sufficient force for the transaction of the work in the document-room by the employment of two additional assistant clerks on the permanent roll and one laborer, believing that the Doorkeeper, whom, of course, the committee can not control, will retain Whitely, a skilled assistant in that room, and will add, the committee hope, for the interest of the business of that room and for the benefit of the members of the House, the two other skilled assistants, who are now there as volunteers and who can be appointed under the substitute resolution recommended by the committee, so that the laborers may be provided at the expense of the Government rather than at the expense of the employés of the document-room.

It has come to the attention of your committee that for the performance of the duties required in the document-room skilled labor is absolutely necessary, and that unless such is employed it will be impossible to transact, with any degree of propriety, the business of the document-room, even with the increase of force which is given by the substitute resolution.

This briefly explains the views of the committee concerning this matter. They have tried to limit the additional force to be employed to the number which they consider to be properly necessary. They believe if this addition is made to the permanent roll of the document-room; if skilled assistants are put into those places provided by this resolution, if it be adopted; and if they and other skilled and permanent employés be retained in service there, that the business pertaining to that room will be properly dispatched and cared for, and that the members of the House will obtain the advantage and benefit of the addition which your committee recommend.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I will be glad to have the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] while I make a remark about this resolution. Of course it is important that the House should have enough employés properly qualified to perform this work about the document-room, and in the folding-room, and in the Clerk's office, but I very much doubt whether this increase ought to be granted; in fact, I think it is quite clear that it ought not to be granted.

There are two document-rooms belonging to the House. One is under the Doorkeeper, with the following salaries: One superintendent, $2,000; one assistant superintendent, $2,000; one assistant doorkeeper detailed by action of the House to the document room, $2,000; one file clerk, $1,400; one assistant file clerk, $1,314; making $8,714. Then in the Clerk's document-room, a different organization, but attached to the House, there is: One superintendent with a salary of $2,000; one clerk, $1,400; two laborers, $900 each, or $1,800; making $5,200; in all, $13,914.

The gentleman from Rhode Island tells us that in addition to these employés there are six other employés—six in the House document-room, I understood him to say. Three are on the rolls, detailed by the Doorkeeper, one skilled man paid by the employés already in the document-room and paid out of their own salaries, and two volunteers, skilled men, the gentleman says, who no doubt will ask to be paid hereafter.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not quite correct; there are three detailed from other rolls; there are also two volunteers serving with no pay.

Mr. CANNON. That makes five.

Mr. SPOONER. That makes five. Then there is a colored laborer who is paid by the employés here for doing actual laborer's work.

Mr. CANNON. That makes six, outside of the roll, for the document-room under the Doorkeeper and the Clerk's document-room, which are run at an annual cost of $13,914, and include nine employés. There are three other employés detailed from other rolls, one paid by these employés and two volunteers, skilled men, the gentleman says.

We have been in the habit of saying, so far as we can, under the rules of this House, that on the Senate side there is an expensive organization. Let us see, then, what they have there in the way of a document-room force. They have one superintendent at $2,000; two assistant superintendents at $1,440 each; one clerk at $1,440, and one page at $720; making an aggregate of $6,040 per annum. Gentlemen will bear in mind that the Senate force does all that is done on the House side by the forces in the document-room and the Clerk's document-room combined, and I must say, as most gentlemen here know, that the document-room on the Senate side is in "apple-pie order." If you go or send for a document there, you are sure to get a prompt answer and to get the exact document that you send for with certainty and readiness. A gentleman near me says that some of us often go there. Yes, that is the case with me. I do frequently go or send there for documents, but the gentleman knows what his own experience has been. Now, I suggest and believe that instead of giving this increase of force the Committee on Accounts might, perhaps, better give its attention to the reorganization of the whole force in the House document-room. Certainly I think it might well give its attention to the consolidation of the Clerk's document-room and the document-room under the Doorkeeper.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will my colleague state whether that subject is within the jurisdiction of the committee?

Mr. CANNON. If referred to it by the House it occurs to me that it would be.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman offer a resolution to that effect.

Mr. CANNON. I am talking now; but perhaps my friend [Mr. ADAMS] will introduce a resolution to recommit this proposition to the committee with instructions while I finish my few remarks here. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to assume the burden of this matter. I am in the minority. I do not want to be captious; I do not want to assume the burden of organizing or running the force of this House, because I have no power to do it and this side of the House has no power to do it; but I know that my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] stand out like beacons in a storm upon all matters relating to economy, and I have no doubt that any suggestion they may make will be accepted by the majority of the House. I speak in all good faith, because those gentlemen are prominent advocates of economy in all matters, and they, with myself and others, have to report the bills making provision for carrying this force after the House determines what it shall be, and now is the time to determine what it shall be. In all seriousness, I submit to gentlemen on the other side whether it has not almost become an open secret that persons are placed upon the House rolls—I will not say by wholesale, but at least largely by retail—who draw the pay and, to say the least of it, perhaps do not work more than the legal eight hours a day in the service of the House. Having said this much, having called attention to the number of employés doing this kind of work on the House side, and shown that it is double as great as the force on the Senate side, and having suggested the desirability of consolidating these two document forces on the House side, I now call attention to the fact that the number of employés on our rolls has been considerably increased from time to time by the action of the House, and largely, or at least to some extent, on the recommendations of the Committee on Accounts—recommendations very frequently reported by minority members of that committee. Of course I do not desire to criticise the action of the committee. Of course there is nothing improper about it.

Mr. SPOONER. I will say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], if he will permit me, that they are always the reports of the majority of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; reports of the majority, but presented here by members of the minority. That is all proper enough; I have no right to find fault with it; but I remember that formerly, when the conditions were different in this House, when there was a Republican administration, such things did not often happen as the presentation of reports by members on the other side of the House in favor of increasing the force on the House rolls. On the contrary, such propositions were very generally opposed by gentlemen on that side, and when I recall the eloquent appeals of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], appeals which almost brought tears to my eyes, about the waste of the public money, I am surprised that the majority of the Committee on Accounts and the majority of this House will sit by and allow the force on our rolls to be increased in this way day after day. The statement of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER] was significant when he said that we needed skilled men in the document-room. He says there is one man there who is being paid by the employés, and two others, volunteers, not employed under any law, who are skilled men. That is his remark, not mine.

Mr. SPOONER. Not the one paid by the employés. He is simply a laborer.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask whether the gentleman from Rhode Island proposes to cut off discussion or to let this side of the House have an opportunity to debate the question.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt the gentleman will do so; but for the time being I have the floor, and I have it because I happened to sit by my friend from Rhode Island, and I rose in a very leisurely manner, not thinking I was trenching upon anybody, and asked him to yield to me. I did not hear an uproarious demand from the other side for time. I looked, and looked in vain, for somebody to ask him to yield.

I only call attention to these matters by way of admonition. I fear, gentlemen, unless you come to the rescue upon this and other matters, somebody of the sixty million people throughout the length and breadth of the country may intimate that the Democratic side of the House are no longer beacon-lights of economy in the storm of extravagance that is sweeping over the country. [Laughter.] That is all I want to say.

Mr. SPOONER. I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to have a little longer time.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not expect to occupy the entire ten minutes; but I would like to ask the gentleman from Rhode Island in the first place whether the Committee on Accounts have ascertained the number of employés under the Doorkeeper and the whole number of employés connected with the business of this House?

Mr. SPOONER. Does the gentleman mean the entire force under the Doorkeeper?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. One hundred and fifty-four.

Mr. REAGAN. Is that the entire force of the Doorkeeper?

Mr. SPOONER. That is the entire force.

Mr. REAGAN. Can the gentleman tell us how many employés there are in the Clerk's office?

Mr. SPOONER. I have not the record of that matter here.

Mr. REAGAN. Or in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. SPOONER. I have not the record here.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, we have two good captains' companies in the employ of the Doorkeeper of this House, and occasionally we want to put some special man in by a resolution of the House appointing him—probably one of the lowest class of employés.

I think that what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has suggested was well deserved on this side of the House. We have promised the people who have chosen a majority of Democrats in this House and who have elected a Democratic President that we would endeavor to reform the practices of the Government, to retrench its expenditures, and to relieve the people so far as possible from the burdens of taxation, yet it never seems to occur to members on this floor to invoke this principle of retrenchment when a question arises here which would enable them practically to carry out, if they would, this doctrine. Are we going to forget that our claim to the support of the American people rests upon the idea that we will give them honest government and cheap government? In the face of this expectation are we going to multiply employés of this House and employés of the Government everywhere? I undertake to say that the number of employés in this House at this time ought to be greatly reduced instead of increased.

Two captains' companies in the Doorkeeper's department of this House! Not expecting to participate in this discussion I have not had the opportunity to ascertain the expense of the administration of the Doorkeeper's department. The gentleman from Rhode Island has stated, as I understand, that there are one hundred and fifty employés in that office. Sir, the time is within my memory when one-fourth of that number were not in the employment of this House. We go on from year to year increasing the number of employés—sometimes because there seems to be some special emergency, but oftener, I suppose, because members of the House desire to have their friends appointed to office. I know that the Doorkeeper and the Clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms are importuned to make appointments continually. Their only relief, if they would satisfy those who seek the appointment, is to get authority to make additional appointments. This tends to accommodate the men who want employment, the men who want to draw money from the Treasury, but these people are accommodated at the expense of the tax-payers of this country.

Now, I understand that we have upon the Doorkeeper's roll two more employés than we had in the last Congress, yet we had then exactly the same number of members that we have now. And this is the early part of the session, when there is nothing like the amount of labor to be performed that there will be at a later period. Almost always we are called upon toward the close of a session to authorize additional assistance in the folding-room and the Clerk's office. But here we are at the beginning of a session proposing to put additional persons upon the roll!

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen on this side of the House will remember what they have pledged themselves to the people of this country to do. I trust that they will authorize no more expenditures until it shall be shown to be necessary to make them. I think the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois is eminently proper—that the Committee on Accounts be instructed to secure a reorganization of the force in the offices of the Doorkeeper, the Clerk, and the Sergeant-at-Arms, and reduce the number of employés to what are practically required. If we do this, we shall render a service for which the country will thank us—a service in the right direction.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to put a question to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER]. As I understand, it has been stated that six men have been detailed from other service in the House to serve in the document-room.

Mr. SPOONER. There have been three detailed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman does not state whether those three could be spared from the departments in which they were regularly employed.

Mr. SPOONER. We are informed from the Doorkeeper's office that the detail made in the document-room from other rolls has improperly weakened the force where these employés properly belong.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the gentleman will allow me just one moment——

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I am very much disposed to give credit and effect to reports of committees charged with examination into these details about the business of the House. But I am free to confess that I am not a little impressed with the statements which have been made about the apparent scarcity of skilled labor in these departments where many persons are employed and where special skill is required. I am very much impressed with the statements as to the enormous increase in the number of those who served the House in subordinate capacities; and it is not shown that there has been any commensurate increase of public business. I believe, sir, that there is a far greater question involved than the mere expenditures in the service of the House, as noted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

The House of Representatives, the particular representatives of the people, if they are profligate in authorizing expenditures in their own service, taint economy at its very fountain-head. And I have grave doubts, therefore, as to whether or not the clerical force of the House should not be materially reduced. And I wish the Democratic part of that committee could give us some expressions and statistics that would allay the fears and anxieties of unnecessary expenditures here at the very supervising point of the Government. And until that is done, Mr. Speaker, I shall not vote for any further increase in the clerical force of the House.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield to the gentleman for that time.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do believe some increase in that particular department is necessary. Now, when the Committee on Accounts is instructed to inquire into that particular subject, how can it say a deficiency in the service of that particular department might be supplied by detail from other departments of the Government until the subject of the entire clerical force of this House has been submitted to that committee?

And in answer to what I consider a rather discourteous reflection on that committee from my distinguished colleague, I will remind him in the House that no proposition for such a reorganization could come from that committee unless the House chose to refer that subject to it, because that committee has only jurisdiction of questions touching the expenditure of the contingent fund of the House, auditing and settling all accounts which may be charged thereon by order of the House.

And it strikes me as coming from a rather peculiar source when my distinguished colleague, himself so long an ornament of the Committee on Appropriations, should refer to the subject which has been within the control of that distinguished committee time out of mind. And I think it will be found by reference to every appropriation bill which has passed this House that any want of congruity in the service of this House springs from incongruous provisions in the annual appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. It is true that I have had the honor for some Congresses past to be a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and that we have reported bills making appropriations for this service, as well as for other branches of the Government, which have been discussed in the Committee of the Whole. Now I will say to my colleague that I am of the opinion that if this service, by some committee having the power, were thoroughly gone over, there might be considerable reduction. And, sir, my remarks were in the light of that fact and of the further fact that the already liberal amounts reported by the Committee on Appropriations and passed by the House and Senate are to be increased by the Committee on Accounts and paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. What I desire to call the attention of at least this side of the House to is this: My friend seemed to consider the minority of the Committee on Accounts responsible for any lack of congruity in the disposition of the public money out of the contingent fund, while he himself in this Congress and in the last represented the minority of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. I am sure my colleague does not wish to misunderstand me. My point was this: that so far as I have spoken of the minority of the Committee on Accounts it has been that in the main this increase of the House force, while agreed to by the Committee on Accounts, a majority of which is on the other side, yet when they come to be reported here, whether by accident or otherwise—I presume by accident—are reported by members of the minority of the committee. I merely called attention to that fact.

Mr. HEPBURN. The minority members pulled the chestnuts out of the fire. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Yes, as my friend from Iowa states, the minority in the House pulled the chestnuts out of the fire for them.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The five minutes yielded to the gentleman have expired.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island to yield to me further.

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois for three minutes.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to call the attention of the House to what I consider the root of the whole evil. It is a false economy by which certain departments of the House are given a regular force insufficient to perform the service of that particular department, so that a particular department has to depend on details from other departments. On a superficial view that is economy, because when this day or this week a particular department has not enough to do, it may be considered economy to supply the deficiency from other departments by detail; but in my judgment it is not economy, it is extravagance, because this custom of detailing persons from one part of the service leads to confusion in the service of the House as a whole. Therefore I agree that the true and permanent remedy is to reorganize the service of the House. But the Committee on Accounts had only referred to it this particular department in which it recognizes a deficiency. Therefore it was proper to consider that, and they were not bound to go over the whole service of the House to say whether that deficiency might not be made good by superfluity elsewhere. I consider it is the duty of any member of that committee to report what the majority might request him to report, whether he belongs to the minority or majority side of the House.

I thank the gentleman from Rhode Island for yielding to me.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-eight minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest, as I always do, to the remarks of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] on the other side of the House; and I would like to ask him now, in connection with his remarks, whether or not the committee of which he was a member in the last Congress—the committee having charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—did not in that bill increase both the salaries and the number of these officers of the House?

Mr. CANNON. I will take pleasure in answering the gentleman as far as I can from recollection. My recollection is that in some cases that committee made provision for such increase, but I am not sure whether they reported the increase or not. Some increases were made in the law; but I will remind my friend——

Mr. HOLMAN. But by the action of the Senate, not of the House.

Mr. CANNON. My friend from Indiana says by the action of the Senate, but not of the House. But I will remind my friend from Arkansas, and the gentleman from Indiana also, that no bill can pass into an act without the concurrence of the House as well as the Senate; and, if I recollect correctly, the House in the last Congress had between seventy and eighty Democratic majority.

Mr. ROGERS. I will now take the floor in my own right, as I want a portion of my time myself.

Mr. CANNON. I was only answering the question of the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. My information is, Mr. Speaker, that that Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress increased both the number and the salaries of these officers, not through the instrumentality of the Senate, but directly through the instrumentality of the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

Now, sir, there are one or two observations which I desire to make in connection with this subject. My friend from Illinois not only takes occasion to criticise this side of the House for measures of this sort, but he seeks in the same connection to criticise the competency of the force of the House in this regard. There are two considerations that ought not to be overlooked in this connection in comparing the force of the two Houses; one is that the Senate is a conservative body, their officers being in position through many years and become necessarily better skilled and more thoroughly familiar with the business than those who are subjected, as is the case with the House employés, to frequent changes, just as the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has become stronger by his long service in the House than he was when he first became a member of this body. There is another matter which is important to be considered. The Senate document-room is very small compared with that of the House of Representatives. The membership of that body is much smaller, and, in addition, their documents are not near so numerous; so, as a matter of fact, it is well known that we can get documents or reports from that end of the Capitol even sooner than we can get them from the House document-room for reasons growing out of the considerations which I have suggested.

In this connection permit me, sir, to make another observation. Twice within my recollection during the present session of Congress I have voted against increasing the present force of the House on reports of committees, because I believe the Committee on Accounts had made recommendations not warranted by the facts; and believing that the House should not undertake to furnish clerks for committees which in my judgment had no practical need for them I voted against them. And here let me say that it seems to me we are now right at a point, with reference to the House force, where we may begin to practice economy. Heretofore, if it is a committee that wants a clerk, friends appeal to us upon the score of friendship to stand by them and give them a clerk. If the demand is from some other quarter, there is always some similar appeal which is made to us; and so it goes on, whatever avenue or line of approach there is, always some plea to increase the expenses and enlarge the force of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat my opinion is that we have reached a point when we can apply the rule of economy to the organization of the House, and the first and best step in that direction is to begin in the House right here and now. The people of this country will have no confidence or respect for us or our professions of economy so long as we progress in this broad avenue of increasing the force of the House of Representatives, unless such increase can be based upon some better ground than has been submitted up to this time in this argument. And so from this point on, let it come from what committee it may or what end of the Capitol, unless better grounds can be furnished than those set forth here I intend to cast my vote uniformly against increasing the patronage of the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPOONER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt in the mind of any gentleman that economy is a most desirable thing. We have had lessons of economy preached to us from the other side of the House for a good many years. There has been no campaign within the last four or five years but what the virtues, or this virtue of economy has been always and on all occasions sounded in that connection. We have been told in every part of the country, on every stump, in all the Democratic newspapers, that the Republican party was most wastefully extravagant. We have been told that there were multitudinous armies of unnecessary office-holders, who were eating up the substance of the people. How familiar is this cry to every gentleman. I can see a response in every face, for every one recognizes that sound wherever they have heard a Democratic speech or read a Democratic newspaper during the last five years.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, there is scarcely a bureau officer or a Department officer in office to-day that has made his annual report who has not clamored for an increase of clerical force. All over these Departments and throughout these bureaus we find that there is a necessity for additional force, giving the lie direct to this charge of wanton extravagance on the part of the party that has just gone out of power.

Look at the increases with reference to this House that are being made. I confess that I am in favor of the adoption of this resolution. I believe that these particular officers are necessary to the prompt dispatch of the business of that department. There perhaps may be entirely too many employés connected with that particular branch of the service; but, sir, it is the ornamental part that is entirely too numerous. I have been told that there is a large number of officers connected with our Navy Department that are entirely useless because their rank is so great that there is no place for them to serve. That is the difficulty with this particular department. We have got three superintendents and nobody to superintend.

If you go into that department you will find there is a need for the skilled laborers, for those who actually manipulate the documents and furnish them to you. There is a need for those. The difficulty is there is too much rank there; there are too many gentlemen sitting around that are entirely ornamental. That there ought to be something done with that department there is no doubt. The valuable documents that come there go to the more zealous members of the House; the gentlemen that are there earliest get them and get them all, to the exclusion of those who may not know to the very day when the documents are received. There is no record kept at all, as I am informed, and no charges are made against any member as to the documents that he may receive. That part of the business is entirely dispensed with, useful as it might seem to be.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the employment of these clerks. I believe they are necessary to the proper dispatch of business. I think, however, in the interest of economy we might dispense with some of those we already have there.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPOONER. I simply desire to say a few words in closing this debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SPOONER. The gentleman who last occupied the floor has criticised the administration of the business in the document-room. That, of course, is something the Committee on Accounts in considering this resolution had nothing to do with.

The Committee on Accounts has been criticised because it has recommended clerks for certain committees here; and yet the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] must recollect, or, if not, he will ascertain by reference to the record, that when the Committee on Accounts reported to the House that certain committees should not in their opinion have clerks, the House quite promptly corrected that decision of the committee by voting down that recommendation and giving clerks to certain committees.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. The House may have done so, but they did not get my vote.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps not, and I think not mine, because I believe I acted in concert with the opinion and judgment of the committee at that time, as I am doing now. But that was the fact, nevertheless, that the House did vote down that recommendation of the committee; and so instructed, the committee could see no reason why two or three other committees, then unfurnished with clerks, were not quite as much entitled to them as the committee against which they had reported at the time to which I refer. Consequently they made favorable reports for these other committees, acting, as they believed, in consonance with the instructions they had received by the vote of the House.

The Republican minority of the committee has been criticised by my friend on the left [Mr. CANNON]. I will simply say as to that I am not knowingly partisan in my action upon this committee. I have Republican convictions perhaps quite as strong as those of the gentleman from Illinois, but I do not consider that in my action upon this committee I am required to act otherwise than I consider for the best interest of the House, and for providing in as far as my action can for the proper discharge of its business. In that light I have acted in this committee; in that light I have voted in this committee; in that light I have, under instructions of this committee, submitted this report to the House, advocating it because it seems to me on my judgment irrespective of any partisan consideration a proper resolution to be adopted.

The service of the Senate document-room has been referred to; they have good service in the Senate document-room, principally because it is a permanent service, exactly what I am urging and what the committee has urged in the report should be adopted in this House, by giving a permanent service to this document-room instead of a service taken from other rolls, from time to time, of men who are unfamiliar with the duties to be required of them there. The skilled service in the document-room consists largely in the knowledge of where things are, where certain documents are placed, how they should be placed, and in what order, and where they can be found to be delivered when called for; matters which are only learned by actual experience in discharging the duties of that office.

It is in the line of advancing these interests that this resolution is recommended. Your committee is not pretending to say that this is going to accomplish everything. It will accomplish nothing, in my judgment, unless the suggestions which have been made here concerning an expert service and securing attention to the duties of the office are carried out practically and effectually. If that is not done, I do not think we shall have any better service with this increased force than we have now or than we have had in the past. Gentlemen have referred here to a reorganization of the force of the House. However proper that might be, it is not, as has been suggested here, within the scope of the present duties of the Committee on Accounts. It certainly is not within the scope of the duties of the committee in connection with this resolution, although it is a matter that perhaps might well be gone into and from which good results might be obtained. But let me repeat—for I understand from the questions put to me by two or three different gentlemen that there is some misunderstanding as to the scope of this substitute resolution—let me repeat, in conclusion, that the resolution which the committee recommend calls for an increase of the permanent force of the House document-room to the extent of two additional file clerks and one laborer. That is all.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman permit a question in this connection?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. If it is a proper question, I wish to ask the gentleman whether there are not at least twenty applications now pending before the Committee on Accounts for additions to the force of the House?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, there have been several resolutions introduced and referred to our committee calling for an increase of the force in various directions. I can not now undertake to state the exact number, but the files of the House will of course show.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will permit a word further, I put that question because my information is that there are now pending before the Committee on Accounts resolutions calling for twenty-two additions to the present force of the House.

Mr. SPOONER. Very likely.

Mr. ROGERS. May I ask the gentleman one other question? Is this report of your committee a unanimous report?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, my recollection (if I am entitled to express it) is that this report is unanimous. There certainly has been no minority report of which I have any knowledge; and, so far as I do know anything about it, this is the unanimous report of the committee. But at all events this matter must rest upon its own foundation, and in determining this question it is immaterial, I take it, how many other applications for increase may be pending. The Committee on Accounts now recommend only this increase which I have stated—two file clerks and one laborer.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. How does this report of your committee, which provides for an increase of force in the document-room to the extent of only three additional men, at a very moderate rate of pay, compare in point of economy with the action of the House this morning in voting forty or fifty thousand dollars for the reprinting of a book merely to ornament the libraries of a few doctors?

Mr. SPOONER. I can not answer that question. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for the vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the report.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. At what stage is a motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order now. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COX], who offers a resolution, which will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That this resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Accounts, with instructions to ascertain the number and compensation of the officers and employés of the House, including committee clerks and messengers, and to report what reduction in number and compensation may be made without diminishing the efficiency of the force, and what increase, if any, is necessary in any branch thereof. Said committee shall have the right to report at any time, by bill or otherwise, fixing the number and compensation and prescribing the duties of all such officers and employés.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit, with instructions, the pending resolution reported from the Committee on Accounts.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 27.

So the motion to recommit with instructions was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion to recommit with instructions was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now proceed to call the standing and select committees for reports.

OMAHA NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with amendment the bill (S. 1120) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Omaha National Bank, of Omaha, Nebr.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED GUN-CARRIAGES.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio (by Mr. BRAGG), from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 1143) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the Somerville Grand Army of the Republic, of Somerville, Mass., four condemned gun-carriages, to be used for monumental purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BARRACKS AT SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio (by Mr. BRAGG), from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 5401) making appropriations for additional barracks at the southern, northwestern, and western branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' HOMES WEST OF ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio (by Mr. BRAGG), from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2075) to provide for the location and erection of a branch home for disabled volunteer soldiers west of the Rocky Mountains; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio (by Mr. BRAGG), also reported back adversely, from the Committee on Military Affairs, bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 1437) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either of the States of Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, or Colorado, or Dakota Territory, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 167) to provide for the establishment of a branch soldiers' home in the State of California.

FORT BRADY, MICH.

Mr. CUTCHEON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 753) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. CUTCHEON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 3490) to provide for the sale of the old site of Fort Brady, Michigan, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon; which was laid on the table.

MISSOURI HOME GUARDS.

Mr. DARGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 216) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates of discharge to certain members of the Missouri Home Guards; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SECTION 4787 REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. FINDLAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 1834) to amend section 4787 of the Revised Statutes; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. NEGLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4232) to reimburse the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for losses incurred through the failure of the Exchange National Bank of Norfolk, Va., and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FORT SELDEN MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. ERMENTROUT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 661) granting the right of way through the Fort Selden military reservation, in New Mexico, to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WARD, of Indiana, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 4359) to regulate the establishing of post-offices and mail service in the States and Territories of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 3052) relating to the delivery of mail matter at post-offices;

A bill (H. R. 3719) to enable the people to name their postmasters;

A bill (H. R. 2453) regulating the naming of post-offices in cities, towns, and villages of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 3051) to facilitate the delivery of mail matter.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. BARRY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 4860) to regulate the subletting of contracts for carrying the United States mails; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

TESTS OF STRUCTURAL MATERIALS.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 2085, a bill (H. R. 5555) authorizing the President to appoint a commission of experts, skilled in the investigation, production, and use of metallic substances, and other structural materials, to execute tests and experiments on iron, steel, and other materials used in the construction of bridges, buildings, and mechanical structures, and deduce useful rules therefrom; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, GREENVILLE, S. C.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with an amendment the bill (S. 549) for a public building at Greenville, S. C.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, FORT SMITH, ARK.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, also reported back with an amendment the bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal-revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail, in the city of Fort Smith, Ark.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, DALLAS, TEX.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, also reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2410) for the addition of a third story to the public building in Dallas, Tex.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Mr. ROCKWELL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with an amendment the bill (S. 263) providing for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ANNAPOLIS, MD.

Mr. COLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (S. 201) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Annapolis, Md.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LABORERS' WAGES.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, from the Committee on Labor, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5310) to protect mechanics, laborers, and servants in their wages; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS OF BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, from the Committee on Labor, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4857) granting relief to the employés in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, United States Treasury; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES J. JOHNSTON.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Patents, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 1773) for the relief of James J. Johnston; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRIETTA H. COLE.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Patents, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 200) for the relief of Henrietta H. Cole; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WAR CLAIM.

Mr. SHAW, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1065) to provide for paying certain advances made to the United States by the States of Maryland and Virginia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to present the views of the minority; which were ordered to be printed with the majority report.

WAR CLAIM OF 1812.

Mr. TRIGG, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2498) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and settle the accounts of certain States and of the city of Baltimore, growing out of moneys expended by said States and the city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC DOMAIN, NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1413) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. LYMAN, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3372) for the relief of Jacob Bogert; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAN-ELECTRIC TELEPHONE.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, submitted the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish the report read?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes; I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 12, 1886.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to whom was referred the resolution of the House authorizing an inquiry into expenditures in the matter of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies, a copy of which is embraced in exhibit hereto attached and marked A, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

The resolution directed and empowered the committee to make full inquiry into any expenditure on the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies. The committee having said resolution under consideration, at its meeting held on February 4, adopted the preamble and resolutions attached hereto, marked A, and a copy thereof was transmitted to each head of the Treasury and Interior Departments and the Department of Justice. Answers have been received from each of the said Departments, the originals of which are attached to this report and marked respectively Exhibits B, C, and D. From them it appears that the sum of $35.80 has been spent for printing the opinions in the Department of the Interior, and the Solicitor-General has contracted for fees to be paid by the United States to the amount of $8,000, and for other fees not fixed at the date of the answer from the Department of Justice. These and no other expenses appear to have been incurred. The author of the resolution, Mr. HANBACK, was called upon to suggest any further evidence, but had none to offer on the specific question put by the resolution referred to this committee by the House.

Your committee did not feel authorized to go beyond the question thus submitted.

Your committee has for these reasons sent for no persons and has incurred no expense.

EUSTACE GIBSON, Chairman.

EXHIBIT A.

Whereas the House of Representatives has passed a resolution, introduced by Hon. LEWIS HANBACK, member of Congress from the State of Kansas, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be empowered to make full inquiry into any expenditure upon the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies; and for the purpose of this investigation, and to the end that the people may be fully advised, the committee is granted the right to send for persons and papers, all expenses to be audited and accounted for upon approved vouchers, and when so approved to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated:" Therefore,

Resolved, first, That the chairman of this committee notify Mr. HANBACK in writing, that at its meeting on the 13th day of February, 1886, this committee will begin to "inquire into any expenditure on the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies," and will hear any evidence he may submit or suggest pertinent to such inquiry.

Resolved, second, That a copy of said resolution of the House be furnished to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General of the United States, with a request that each of them furnish this committee as soon as practicable with copies of any papers or documents in their possession, custody, or control, showing anything with regard to "any expenditure on the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies," whether said expenditures have been paid or obligations therefor incurred.

Resolved, third, That the form of notice to Hon. LEWIS HANBACK and of requests to said officers above mentioned shall be a copy of these three resolutions.

EXHIBIT B.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 12, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a transcript of the proceedings of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice at its meeting held on the 4th instant, relating to a resolution directing the committee to "inquire into any expenditure on the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies," and calling upon this Department to furnish the committee, as soon as practicable, with copies of any papers or documents in its possession, custody, or control showing, with regard to any expenditure on the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies, whether said expenditures have been paid or obligations therefor incurred.

In reply thereto I have to state that the records of this Department do not show that any expenditures have been incurred by the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies, nor are there any papers or documents in its possession, custody, or control relative to the rights of said companies.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. EUSTACE GIBSON,
Chairman Committee on Expenditures in Department of Justice,
House of Representatives.

EXHIBIT C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, February 10, 1886.

SIR: In response to resolution of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice that said committee inquire into any expenditure on the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies, I have the honor to state that the only expenditure incurred by this Department, so far, has been for the printing of 500 copies each of the opinions of the Secretary of the Interior, the First Assistant Secretary, and the Assistant Secretary, at a total cost of $35.80.

Very respectfully,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

Hon. EUSTACE GIBSON,
Chairman Committee on Expenditures in Department of Justice,
House of Representatives.

EXHIBIT D.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, February 8, 1886.

SIR: Your communication of the 6th instant, transmitting a transcript of the proceedings of your committee relating to the resolution directing the committee "to inquire into any expenditure on the part of the Government relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies," has been referred to me by the Attorney-General. In reply I have the honor to inform you that no expenditure whatever has yet been made on the part of the Government in the matter referred to. The suit instituted in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Tennessee, upon the application of the National Improved Telephone Company, has been discontinued. No money was expended in that suit on the part of the Government and no obligation to spend any was incurred.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Interior Department, it has been determined to institute a suit in the name of the United States to test the validity of the patent issued to Alexander Graham Bell on the 7th of March, 1876. Recognizing the great importance to the Government and people of the proposed suit (with the conduct and management of which I am charged under section 347 of the Revised Statutes), I have deemed it necessary and proper to employ and retain assistant attorneys and counsel. Accordingly, Hon. A. G. Thurman, of Ohio; Grosvenor B. Lowrey, esq., of New York; Messrs. Hunton & Chandler and C. S. Whitman, esq., of this city, have been retained. No arrangement has yet been concluded with Messrs. Thurman and Lowrey as to the fee to be paid to them, but the amount of their fee will be fixed as soon as they arrive in this city. The services of Messrs. Hunton & Chandler have been engaged for $5,000, and the services of Mr. Whitman for $3,000. It may be proper to add that the conduct of the suit referred to has been devolved upon myself by the Attorney-General because he felt himself to be under disability in this instance.

Very respectfully,

JOHN GOODE, Solicitor-General.

Hon. EUSTACE GIBSON,
Chairman of Committee on Expenditures in Department of Justice,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees is now concluded. The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule begins at 2 o'clock.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was under consideration before the hour expired immediately after the call of the roll upon the passage of the bill. I intended to submit the motion to reconsider and lay on the table the vote by which the bill was passed. I perceive from the RECORD that the first motion appears only to have been entered. If in order, I now move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair held that notwithstanding the expiration of the hour for the consideration of bills, the motion to reconsider might be made and entered by the gentleman from Illinois, because it was a privileged motion under the rules, but that no other motion could be made in regard to the bill at that time. The motion to reconsider is now pending. What motion does the gentleman from Illinois desire now to submit?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ANDERSON of Kansas, Mr. WEAVER of Iowa, and Mr. McMILLIN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names and location.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] moves to lay that on the table, upon which motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 29 members voting in favor thereof and 68 in opposition.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 94, not voting 114; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to record my vote upon this motion.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat when his name was called?

Mr. HALE. I was in committee at the time the roll was called, and desire to vote "ay" upon this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The rule prohibits the Speaker from entertaining a request for unanimous consent under such circumstances.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can accomplish his purpose by stating how he would have voted.

Mr. HALE. If present, I should have voted "ay."

On motion of Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. BARBOUR with Mr. PRICE, until further notice.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. GROSVENOR, until further notice.

Mr. BARNES with Mr. HISCOCK, until further notice.

Mr. PINDAR with Mr. HITT, until further notice.

Mr. CROXTON with Mr. BRADY, until further notice,

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. BURLEIGH, until February 17.

Mr. HILL with Mr. COOPER, until February 15.

Mr. SOWDEN with Mr. HIESTAND, until February 18.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. SYMES, for this day.

Mr. MILLS with Mr. VAN SCHAICK, for to-day.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. LIBBEY, for this day.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. NELSON, for this day.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. ROCKWELL, for to-day.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. WHITING, for this day.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. BLOUNT, until further notice.

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. MAYBURY, until further notice.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. PETTIBONE, for this day.

Mr. DAWSON with Mr. HAYDEN, for to-day. Mr. DAWSON would vote "no."

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, with Mr. HANBACK, for this day.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, for this day.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. HARMER, for this day.

Mr. GREEN, of North Carolina, with Mr. BRUMM, for this day.

Mr. MCCREARY with Mr. LOUTTIT.

Mr. LANDES with Mr. WAIT.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Speaker, I notice that I am announced as being paired with my colleague, Mr. CROXTON. That pair relates to political questions only. Not regarding this as a political question, I desire that my vote shall stand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right of course to exercise his own judgment.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, I am announced as being paired with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANDES]. If he were present, I should vote "ay" on this motion.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was called.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. The Committee on Banking and Currency, I believe, desire to call up another bill.

The SPEAKER. A committee can not call up another bill on the second day. It can only complete the consideration of a measure called up on the first day.

There was no bill called up by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The Committee on Commerce was called.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COOSA RIVER.

Mr. CRISP. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 34) to authorize the East and West Railroad Company of Alabama to maintain a bridge across the Coosa River, with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the East and West Railrond Company of Alabama, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Alabama, be, and is hereby, authorized to maintain a bridge across the Coosa River, in township 14, range 6 east, in the Coosa land district, or at such point near said township as has been selected by said railroad company for crossing said river with their railroad line, the said bridge to be of such height as not to interfere with the navigation of said river.

That any bridge constructed under this act and according to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be known and recognized as a post-route, and the same is hereby declared to be a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or for through passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads leading to the said bridge; and the United States shall have the right of way for a postal telegraph across said bridge: And provided further, That before this act shall take effect said company shall submit to the Secretary of War the plans of said bridge, showing the existing structure and any additions or changes that may be contemplated; and that it shall be decided by the said Secretary that the bridge does not and will not obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of the Coosa River, due regard being had to the character of the proposed navigation of said stream.

SEC. 2. That Congress preserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time; and that if at any time navigation of the said river shall in any manner be obstructed or impaired by the said bridge, the Secretary of War shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to require the said railroad company to alter and change the said bridge, at its own expense, in such manner as may be proper to secure free and complete navigation without impediment; and if upon reasonable notice to said railroad company to make such change or improvements the said company fails to do so, the Secretary of War shall have authority to make the same at the expense of said company, and all the rights conferred by this act shall be forfeited; and Congress shall have power to do any and all things necessary to secure the free navigation of the river.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out at the beginning of the bill the following:

"That the East and West Railroad Company of Alabama, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Alabama, be, and is hereby, authorized to maintain a bridge across the Coosa River, in township 14, range 6 east, in the Coosa land district, or at such point near said township as has been selected by said railroad company for crossing said river with their railroad line, the said bridge to be of such height as not to interfere with the navigation of said river."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the East and West Railroad Company of Alabama, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Alabama, be, and is hereby, authorized to maintain a bridge across the Coosa River, in the Coosa land district, at the point in or near township 14, range 6 east, which has been selected by the said railroad company for crossing said river with their railroad line, and where a bridge is now constructed, the said bridge to be of such height as not to interfere with the navigation of said river, and to be provided with a suitable draw."

Mr. CRISP. This bill has been submitted to the Secretary of War; it meets the approval of the Engineer Department, and is unanimously reported by the Committee on Commerce. Unless some gentleman desires to ask a question about it I call for a vote first on the proposed amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. I notice in the reading of the bill in the first line of section 2 that the word "preserves" is inserted when it ought to be "reserves."

The SPEAKER. That clerical change will be made if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAM ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River, with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Mississippi Water-power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., is hereby authorized and empowered to construct across the Mississippi River, at some point not more than 2 miles from the limits of the said city of Brainerd, a dam, canal, and the appurtenances thereof, for water-power and other purposes, and in connection therewith a wagon and foot bridge for public travel: Provided, That the Government of the United States may at any time construct in connection therewith a suitable lock for navigation purposes: Provided also, That the Government of the United States may at any time take possession of said dam and control the same for purposes of navigation, by paying said company the actual cost of the same, but shall not do so to the detriment of the water-power created by said dam: Provided further, That the Secretary of War may at any time require and enforce, at the expense of the owners, such modification and changes in the construction of said dam as he may deem advisable in the interests of navigation; and that said dam shall, if necessary, be so built that boats and rafts may pass through the same: And provided further, That all suits relative to any obstruction of navigation arising from said dam may be tried in the United States circuit and district courts for Minnesota.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out at the commencement of the bill the words "That the Mississippi Water-power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., is hereby authorized and empowered," and insert in lieu thereof as follows: "That the consent of the Government is hereby given to the Mississippi Water-power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn."

Mr. DUNHAM. I will state that this bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on Commerce, and the same bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce unanimously in the Forty-eighth Congress. The proposition is to give consent of the Government that the dam may be built at Brainerd, Minn., some two hundred miles above the point of navigation. The Committee on Commerce can see no objection to what is asked, and is unanimous in recommending the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this will involve the Government in any damage or liability of any kind?

Mr. DUNHAM. Not at all. It simply gives the consent of the Government that the dam may be built.

Mr. HOLMAN. How far is it from Saint Paul?

Mr. DUNHAM. It is 200 miles above Saint Paul.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I rose to ask the same question as has just been asked by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. I wish to ask further, does not this proposed dam interfere in any way with navigation?

Mr. DUNHAM. No, sir; it interferes with no navigation.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Has not Congress been appropriating money to improve the river above that point?

Mr. DUNHAM. I think not.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am glad to find there is one place on the Mississippi River where Congress has not appropriated money for improvements.

Mr. PAYSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Has the committee considered this point, that when this dam shall be built the company may impose a toll on all rafts or boats that pass through it?

Mr. DUNHAM. No such question came up before the committee.

Mr. PAYSON. By the provisions of this bill I think such tolls might be imposed, and it seems to me a dangerous thing to allow that. The language of the bill is:

> That the Secretary of War may at any time require and enforce at the expense of the owners such modification and changes in the construction of said dam as he may deem advisable in the interests of navigation, and that said dam shall, if necessary, be so built that boats and rafts may pass through the same.

But nothing appears there which prevents a toll from being imposed by the company owning the dam if such boats and rafts shall pass through. It appears to me some provision should be inserted prohibiting anything of the kind.

Mr. DUNHAM. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DUNHAM. There is nothing in the bill which would authorize the charging of any tolls.

Mr. HATCH. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. HATCH. I ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. It can be read in the time of the gentleman. The reading of the report is debate.

Mr. DUNHAM. How much time remains?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes of the hour.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let the report be read. It is short.

The report (by Mr. DUNHAM) was read, as follows:

> The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-power and Boom Company of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River, beg leave to report:
>
> The location of the proposed dam is at the city of Brainerd, on the Upper Mississippi River, over 200 miles by the course of the river above the Falls of Saint Anthony, at Minneapolis, the real head of navigation on the river. On this reach of the river between Minneapolis and Brainerd are now the following obstructions: First, a dam at Saint Cloud, about 100 miles above Minneapolis, constructed by authority of Congress; second, a dam at Sauk Rapids, 3 miles above Saint Cloud, together with the rapids themselves; and, third, the falls and rapids at Little Falls, about 50 miles above Saint Cloud. At Brainerd, the site of the proposed dam, are several rapids, three within 9 miles, all of which would be greatly improved and covered with slack water by the proposed dam. About 200 miles, by the course of the river, above Brainerd, are the so-called "reservoirs," a system of dams at the outlet of certain lakes, penning up and retaining the surplus spring water for use during the summer droughts.
> The proposed dam would be no obstruction to navigation, for there is none to obstruct except logs, for which ample provision is made, and would be but an additional reservoir constructed and maintained, not, as the other reservoirs, at public expense, but at the expense of the party proposing to construct the dam.
>
> A bill similar to the one under consideration was reported by the Committee on Commerce of the Forty-eighth Congress, the report on which is hereto appended and made a part hereof.
>
> The bill is framed conformably to the views of the Government engineer, so as to amply protect the interests of the Government.
> Your committee can see no objection to the construction and maintenance of the proposed dam, and therefore recommend that the bill be amended as follows: Strike out, beginning with the words "That the Mississippi," in line 3, and ending with the words "and empowered," in line 4, inclusive, and insert in the stead thereof the following: "That the consent of the Government is hereby given to the Mississippi Water-power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn.;" and when so amended we recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to amend by adding after the word "same," in line 24, these words, "without the imposition of any toll or charge."

Mr. DUNHAM. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTH, CENTRAL, AND SOUTH AMERICAN EXPOSITION.

Mr. IRION. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 108) authorizing the several Executive Departments of the Government to loan to the North, Central, and South American Exposition at New Orleans certain articles for exhibit.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, &c., That it is desirable, in any way consistent with existing laws, and without risk to Government property or expense to the national Treasury, to encourage the effort being made for the development of industry and commercial relations by the North, Central, and South American Exposition at New Orleans, and it be, and is hereby, approved that the heads of the several Executive Departments shall, in whatever respect they may in their judgment see convenient and proper, loan any articles or material suitable to such purpose: Provided, That such loan be made entirely at the expense and on the responsibility of said American exposition, and shall not be of material needed for use in either Department, and shall not in any way interrupt the daily routine of duty or order in any branch of the Government, and shall be returned to the Department, in good order, within one month after the close of the exposition.

Mr. IRION. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that committee made a unanimous report in its favor. I move that it be now put upon its passage.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will allow that matter to go over until the next morning hour. I will be very glad to have an opportunity to examine it a little and submit a few remarks.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What is the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to this resolution?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will yield to me a moment I will state why I would be glad to have this measure postponed until the next morning hour. My experience in connection with this exposition at New Orleans has not been of a kind to prepossess me in favor of any resolution that looks toward any action of the Government, negative or otherwise, in connection with it. I recollect very well that when this matter was first before the Appropriations Committee in the last Congress, in pursuance, as we thought, of an act passed by a prior Congress, for such appropriation and other favorable action as might enable these exhibits to be used, and the name of the Government to be lent, so to speak, to this exposition, I happened to be a member of the subcommittee that made the recommendation to the full committee that certain appropriations should be made for the benefit of this exposition. I recollect that at that time we tried to limit, and supposed we had limited, the amount that the Government should contribute to the exposition. The name of the Government having been loaned subsequently there came a demand, which Congress felt almost coerced to comply with, for the appropriation of some three or four hundred thousand dollars for the payment of expenses there. And still later there came a call for a very large appropriation to enable the different Departments of the Government to furnish exhibits; and so, step by step, up to that time there had been, according to my present recollection, nothing but expense, disaster, and disappointment to the people and the public Treasury.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CANNON. I will as soon as I complete my statement. This, as I understand it, is a proposition, guarded, I grant you, to make a further loan of the Government exhibits. Whether those exhibits are now in New Orleans, or whether a portion of them are here, I am not informed; but I think a portion of them, if not all, have been returned.

Now, if those exhibits, valuable as they are, should again go to that exposition, I know not whether the Government may not be called upon, in simple self protection, to appropriate a large amount of money to secure their preservation or their return. I certainly have no desire to do any injustice to this enterprise or to make any factious opposition to it, but, remembering so well what has been the experience of Congress in connection with it in the past, I, for one, should be very glad indeed if this matter could go over until the next morning hour, so that it might be looked into more carefully, or else that it should be explained and discussed within this morning hour, so that I, as a member of the House, could vote understandingly upon it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has been speaking of one exposition and this resolution relates to an entirely different exposition. The gentleman from Illinois has been speaking of the World's Industrial Exposition which was held in New Orleans last year. This resolution relates to the North, Central, and South American Exposition, an entirely different institution, which is being held in New Orleans this year.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] whether the exposition to which this resolution relates is not a child, legitimate or illegitimate, of the exposition that was held there last year?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is no child of the one that was held last year. It is the outgrowth of that one, but is an entirely different enterprise. This is called the North, Central, and South American Exposition. Now, Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution appears before Congress at the request of thirty-one of the State commissioners to this exposition, appointed by the governors of the States respectively, and was introduced in pursuance of a resolution adopted by the State commissioners, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the time has arrived when we as State and Territorial commissioners, in charge at the North, Central, and South American Exposition, can with pride and confidence recommend to the world the wonderful display now in place for inspection, contrast, and study, as well worthy a visit by the people of this and other nations; and,

Second. That we learn that the Government exhibit and a part called the "Greely exhibit," that were in this building during the late "World's Exposition," remain unpacked in Washington, and a resolution of Congress is all that is wanting to get them to this exposition, and believing that a resolution of such character as would permit all unpacked articles to be sent to this exposition to be placed where they can be seen would meet the cordial indorsement of the constituents of every Congressman: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the commissioners of the several States and Territories now present at the North, Central, and South American Exposition, That we unanimously request the Congress of the United States to pass such a resolution as will to that body seem meet and proper to the attainment of the end prayed for.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is merely to give to the heads of the Executive Departments of the Government authority, in their discretion, to allow certain articles under the control of their Departments to be carried to New Orleans, without any expense whatever to the Government of the United States, and there placed on exhibition in the North, Central, and South American Exposition. I have been told by that official of the exposition who is here and has been looking after this matter that he has conferred with the heads of the different Departments of the Government and that they have all approved of the proposition. Some of them have stated that they thought they had not in themselves the authority to do this thing, and suggested that Congress pass a resolution giving them authority in their discretion to do it.

Now in pursuance of that suggestion this resolution was introduced and has received the favorable consideration of the Committee on Commerce. It involves not a single dollar of expense to the Government of the United States. The articles which are desired to be placed on exhibition in New Orleans are already packed. Some of them which were in the exposition of last year have been returned to this city and are now in the respective Departments unpacked. The heads of these Departments are willing that certain of these articles be carried back to New Orleans, provided Congress shall give authority to that end.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question at this point?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. What knowledge has the Committee on Commerce, or what knowledge has the House, that in the event these valuable exhibits are carried to New Orleans Congress will not be called upon to appropriate money for their return? In other words, what assurance has the House that the new company will not, like the old, prove entirely insolvent, and that the exhibit of the Government, both as to its preservation and return, will depend upon appropriations to be made by Congress.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. And further——

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not yield any further now, if the gentleman will pardon me. The resolution, I repeat, merely gives to the heads of the different Departments the authority to do this thing. At the same time it admonishes those officers that this is to be done in such a way that the interests of the Government will be cared for, and that the Government will be put to no expense either in sending these exhibits to New Orleans, or maintaining them there, or having them returned here.

Mr. STRUBLE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will.

Mr. STRUBLE. Has the gentleman any information with regard to the probable cost of transporting these exhibits back in case the Government should finally find it necessary to incur that expense?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Personally I have no information on that point. This is a matter, however, relative to which we can trust the heads of the different Departments to protect the Government. This resolution proposing merely to grant permission to the heads of the Departments to make this loan within their discretion, and it being provided that this is to be done without expense to the Government, the commissioners of the exposition will have to satisfy these heads of the Departments that the exposition has the ability to carry these exhibits there, maintain them there, and return them here without expense to the Government.

Mr. HEPBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Suppose, for instance, the Secretary of the Interior should require bonds from the officials of the exposition conditioned for the return of the articles; would that bond be of any value? Could it be enforced?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Well, Mr. Speaker, that question hardly enters into this case. The exhibits which it is desired to carry from this city to New Orleans are but few in number; and the gentlemen conducting this exposition and the association under whose auspices the exposition is being conducted can satisfy the heads of the Departments here of the entire ability of that institution to do what is proposed to be done—to pay all the expense of taking the exhibits to New Orleans and returning them here.

[Here the hammer fell.]

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of reports of committees has expired. By order of the House the remainder of this day's session is set apart for the consideration of the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWINBURNE], who is now entitled to address the committee, is in ill-health, and desires that the Clerk shall read his remarks.

The Clerk was proceeding to read, when——

Mr. DUNHAM said: Mr. Chairman, I desire to put a question for information. May I be allowed to inquire what this document is that the Clerk proposes to read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already announced, and will announce again, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWINBURNE], who is now entitled to address the committee, is in ill-health and desires the Clerk to read his remarks. He is entitled to have them read.

Mr. DUNHAM. Another question for information. If any member of the House desires to ask any question during the reading of this speech, can he ask the gentleman from New York or must he ask the Clerk? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide all points of order as they arise.

The Clerk read the remarks of Mr. SWINBURNE, as follows:

Mr. SWINBURNE. Mr. Speaker, I regret to observe in all the discussions which have taken place in the Senate and House with reference to restoring General Fitz-John Porter to his former standing in the military service too often an inclination to consider the matter from other than grounds of pure justice. Having had some experience at the front during the exciting and trying times of 1862, and knowing full well what the sentiments and feelings of the people of the North were at that time, I can appreciate very easily how such a sentence as that pronounced against General Fitz-John Porter was brought about, and I am fully satisfied that had that court-martial been convened in 1872 instead of 1862 the verdict would have been far different, and the record of a soldier who had been trusted by his commander on previous occasions and always proved able, true, and loyal would have been saved from the disgrace which has been thrown around this man, blighting his whole life and hanging as a heavy burden night and day.

I have had some experience with the Army of the Peninsula, and remembering the jealousies that existed and the embarrassments surrounding every position of responsibility, I feel free to say that it is but justice to this brave soldier that at this time, when we hear so much of conciliation, it is the duty of the Government to restore him to his full position and honors. It will be but a poor plea for justice if the Government awaits, as it has done in other cases, until the man who served the nation in its struggle has passed beyond the courts of men to have eulogies pronounced to his memory. I do not believe it would be a wise precedent to establish that soldiers might with impunity violate the orders of their superiors even in times of peace, much less in the face of an enemy; but in this case I have failed to discover anything in its entire history to satisfy me that he had deliberately violated any order, and after watching the investigation and reading closely what gentlemen have had to say in both branches of the Government when the bills to restore have been under consideration, the worst phase I could place on it was, at most, a tardiness to execute an order, and of even this much I am in serious doubt. Gentlemen who were in active military service and saw their comrades fall around them are pardonable for any hasty judgments then formed; but circumstances are altogether different now, and having become civil leaders, exercising large legislative functions, they should dispassionately weigh in the light of reason the events of the past.

There is not a member of this House, I believe, who would vote more readily to disfranchise and hold forever in disgrace any officer of the Union Army who proved traitor to his country while in service during the rebellion than I. But this charge is not made officially against this officer and never was, and I will hardly lend my vote or voice to confirm the charges made by newspapers as to the loyalty of any officer, notwithstanding my high appreciation of journalists as a class, composed as it is of gentlemen who as a rule love justice, but whose prejudices were, during the rebellion, even greater than those of any other class.

I am free to confess that I believe the findings of the court-martial which condemned this officer were very largely the result of jealousy—a spirit that to me was painfully manifest during my connection with the Army, and which, I think, had a disastrous effect on more than one occasion; and if I am allowed to base my opinion on the published reports of the trial, it seems evident to me that there existed a great deal of this feeling between General Pope and General Porter. General Porter charges that General Pope said—

He had had cause to complain of me prior to my joining, inasmuch as in a letter which had fallen into the President's hands I had commented upon his military conduct and ability, had predicted disasters, and had unjustly criticised as his the plan of the campaign just closed.

This letter was, General Porter says, a private one, written in July, and before he had any idea of joining Pope's command. There is to me even stronger proof of this jealous spirit in the language of the judge-advocate, who said:

As the animus of the accused toward his commanding general in pursuing the line of conduct alleged against him must largely affect the question of his criminality, and may furnish a safe and valuable light for your guidance in determining points otherwise left doubtful by the evidence, it is proper that it should be ascertained before entering at large upon the review of the case which you have instructed me to make.

If this statement be founded on facts, as far as the animus of General Porter is concerned, it is but natural to suppose that a similar feeling was entertained by General Pope, otherwise he would not have allowed one of his aids to declare in his presence—

So certain am I that Fitz-John Porter is a traitor that I would shoot him to-night, so far as any crime before God is concerned, if the law would allow me to do it.

I do not stop to inquire how, under the circumstances, I am to accept this matter; whether it is policy to even insinuate that such a thing as military jealousy existed, or whether the popular opinion is that it did. Suffice it for me to be satisfied that it did exist in every branch of the service, and that its existence did result disastrously to our arms on several occasions, prolonged the war, and brought hardship and death to thousands of brave men. I do not know that the record of Bull's Run could have been changed had the spirit of patriotism and harmony been above all other considerations; but I do not hold Fitz-John Porter responsible for what did occur. It would be impossible for me to entertain any other feelings in the matter than I now entertain without some different developments.

In June, 1862, for the second time, I was commissioned by Governor Morgan as medical superintendent of New York State wounded troops, and on the 20th of that month, by order of General McClellan, placed in charge of all the wounded on the Peninsula, with headquarters at Savage Station. Going to the front of my own volition, without cost to the Government or the State, neither asking nor receiving compensation, rank, or honor other than to help my country and its brave defenders, there were none for me to be jealous of and no motives to prompt such a feeling. I was able to look on with an impartial eye and hear with an unprejudiced ear, and now, after two decades, I declare that in my intercourse with the soldiers of Porter's command I heard nothing but commendation, and with those of his troops who were wounded at Malvern Hill and who came under my care there seemed to be almost as great a love as they bore for their beloved McClellan.

My life-training has been to look for causes, and in my personal observations of the men of Porter's Fifth Corps, as well as those of Heintzelman, Sumner, and others with whom I came in contact at Gaines's Mill, Malvern Hill, and Savage Station I learned many things that I would had been otherwise, but nothing that I considered so detrimental to the service and injurious to the men as jealousy, and was almost forced to believe it was one of the fine arts taught at West Point and essential to a good officer in the regular Army. This jealousy I found was contagious, affecting the volunteers to no small extent, and was possessed in a large degree by societies who claimed to be working for the sick and wounded on the high humanitarian principle. So great was this feeling, that it was with difficulty a volunteer surgeon could get the simplest necessaries because of the jealousy of the regular Army surgeons, and I make bold to assert that this jealousy among the surgeons caused the death of the brave Colonel Newman in Willard's Hotel in this city, whose life I am confident I could have saved when invited to attend him by Senator Wilkinson.

It is far from my desire to appear egotistical or to speak disparagingly of others, but simply refer to this as an instance of what jealousy did accomplish, and may be pardoned in going still further and saying that, commissioned, as I was, by the great State of New York to look after her wounded, I was prevented from doing the work for which I was sent, by order of the War Department, because some regular Army surgeon would rather a brave man should lose his life than have it saved by a volunteer surgeon. Am I saying too much of this jealous spirit or magnifying its importance? If so, it is said because I believe it was the origin of this continued cloud of disgrace which hangs over General Porter, and deprived the brave General McClellan, during his life, of a just recognition that will yet wreath a grander laurel around his memory and place him in history alongside the other departed great military chieftain, General Grant.

There are many things that it would be well could they be forgotten in the events of war, and among them one I might cite as occurring in my own particular branch of the service, where, because of jealousy, a so-called sanitary commission attempted to influence the Legislature of New York from appropriating $200,000 to assist in making its sick and wounded more comfortable simply because of jealousy. In this they failed; but were more successful with the head of the surgical department of the Army in securing his influence to prevent volunteer surgeons going to the front.

I can not believe General Porter deserving this severe sentence. It may be military, but I do not believe it just. I never did know much of military law, and hence came very near being court-martialed myself, or at least I was threatened with being cashiered. When the shot and shell were falling fast and thick among the wounded in the tents we used as hospital at Savage Station, and their limbs were being torn from their bodies, I went out with a flag of truce. One of the corps commanders told me I had violated military law and he would have me cashiered; but as the position was in the hands of the rebels in a few moments, and I, remaining a volunteer prisoner, with the sick and wounded, never was court-martialed. But it would have been an awful thing to have a surgeon, receiving no pay, cashiered, and prevented from ever holding such a rank again for such an offense; and yet it would have been no greater act of injustice than has been visited upon General Porter.

Our forces met with a terrible defeat on that August day at Bull Run, and some person was to be blamed. The excitement of the people and the honor of the commander demanded this much, and had the censure not fallen on General Porter the disaster would have been charged to some other brave man. The American nation does not desire in this day to rob its soldiers of their honor, and it is to be hoped that this Congress and the powers that can restore General Porter to his position will not allow higher principles of right and justice to be dwarfed by any political considerations or prejudices. I was asked by a fellow-member if I would dare to support this bill and face my constituency. My reply is most decidedly "yes." I believe Porter unjustly punished, and even if he were guilty, the punishment has been vastly greater than the offenses charged called for, and it would not be my desire to represent a constituency dead to a sense of justice and they do not want me to.

The nation, or at least that portion which defended the flag, applauds every act of magnanimity of the Government to the conquered, and, while holding treason as odious, has welcomed back every man who was in the rebellion and restored them as rapidly as they have applied. Will the representatives of this people refuse to continue this magnanimity? I believe not, but will go further, and accord justice to every man injured in reputation or in person during those exciting and eventful times. In building up the united nation on a basis more solid than ever before it behooves us to build up a grander sentiment among men, and by according justice in this instance prove to the world that we may sometimes be slow but always honorable.

A brave man with a brave record is pleading before the world and this Congress. Entering the service in early life, eighteen years of his young manhood were spent under his flag, and with drawn sword he followed it through the Mexican war, where he was the only officer in his company left to see it planted in the City of Mexico. Fighting through the early part of the rebellion up to a few days before this unfortunate occurrence, and for his bravery commended by his commander, twice brevetted by the President to be major-general of the volunteers and brevet brigadier-general of the regular Army, the country owes him gratitude, not punishment. For twenty-two years his bravery has been clouded and his life blighted, and now justice appeals for his vindication.

Between General Pope and General Porter there is a decidedly strong question of veracity; but one fact is patent, that it was more than two months after the alleged disobedience of orders that General Porter was relieved from his command and a court-martial convened. In the interim General Porter was in active service in the field and around Washington, and took a prominent part with his corps in the battle of Antietam. To me it does not seem necessary to go again over the scenes of those trying days and thus arouse memories which can not possibly have any other effect than to embitter the feelings of all who were active participants or strong sympathizers. It would require but a few moments for the general in command to have made his charges at the time the crimes alleged were said to have taken place and had General Porter removed from his command.

Whatever military blunders may have occurred are best known to those in command, but it is well known to the whole nation that no charge was then made against General Porter, who was allowed for two months and over to occupy a position of trust and responsibility such as no man not to be relied on should occupy in the face of the enemy. In engagements subsequent to the time when it was charged he committed the offenses for which he was tried and sentenced it is not denied that he maintained his reputation for loyalty and proved himself worthy of the name he had won as an energetic, trusty, brave, and capable officer, and rendered as effective and prompt assistance to General Pope as he had to any other superior officer under whom he served.

Were he guilty and known to have contributed to the defeat of our arms, it was the duty of General Pope to have immediately acted and suspended him, instead of further intrusting him until the mortification of the people became so strong and their denunciation so loud as to require some desperate effort to ward off the storm of indignation which threatened to overwhelm the commanding general. If the charges afterward made against General Porter were true, it appears to me that General Pope was himself criminally culpable in placing the lives of thousands of brave men and the safety of the nation in the hands of a man liable to betray both, or incapable from lack of knowledge or honesty to preserve them. But I do not believe General Pope entertained such feelings, but rather the reverse. Hence my vote shall be cast to restore to his rank one whom I believe to have been misjudged and unfairly treated.

Mr. BRAGG. How much of the time of the gentleman from New York remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. BRAGG. I reserve that time in behalf of the affirmative of the proposition.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, I as a member of that committee was unavoidably absent, and consequently did not have an opportunity to join in either the minority or the majority report. But I now propose to define my position in regard to this measure, which I regard of very great importance; and I approach its discussion perfectly understanding that to attempt to make a speech in regard to this matter now, after all that has been said on the subject, is to travel over a well-beaten road; that in view of the able past discussions which have been had at either end of the Capitol and in the columns of the public press of the country; to attempt to make a speech now would be to restate facts often told and to reproduce arguments already worn and weakened by continued repetition. Therefore, while I shall not attempt to follow in the path of those who have gone into details on this subject, especially in regard to battle scenes of that memorable occasion, yet I feel constrained in the discharge of my duty as a representative upon this floor to say a few things in regard to the real issues involved and the merits presented by this bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

If this were a measure praying for pardon, asking for amnesty, demanding that something should be done to promote that conciliation of which we have heard so much—if it were a bill for the purpose of removing some disqualification imposed for political considerations—it would receive my most cordial, cheerful, and earnest support.

But, owing to the course of the discussion of this measure during the past few years, and the tinge given to it incidentally by the Republicans who have thus far participated in favor of this bill, I ask for a few moments to make some allusion to my own political course in regard to the questions which have grown out of the rebellion. I ask to do this that neither my position nor my motives may be misunderstood or misconstrued when I cast my vote against the passage of this bill, which I believe if passed will be absolutely destructive of the very fabric of government itself.

And, Mr. Chairman, as I have been a rather unobtrusive member on this floor for more than seven years, I beg leave to remark that when the war began I was a Union man, and I have no apology to offer for that. When the war ended I found myself a Republican. Such was the logical result of my convictions, and I have no apology to offer for that. After the war ended I was sometimes called a radical, and I confess I am of a somewhat ardent temperament, and I can not help that. But, sir, I am not now and never have been one of those who hated others because they did not see and believe as I did, and I never could understand the working of those little, contracted minds which entertained malice toward somebody else because of difference of political opinions; and having fully recognized all my life that there was a good deal of human nature in all mankind—always having recognized that each individual should be an intellectual sovereign and entitled to think for himself—I am now and always have been and hope to be liberally and kindly and generously disposed toward everybody who took part in the rebellion, on the wrong as well as on the right side. Knowing as I did and do the circumstances under which the secession craze was precipitated upon the people of the South, there is no people toward whom I have invariably shown a more kindly and generous disposition than toward those who struggled in arms against the integrity of the Union and the nation. And when my State—I will pass from this thought in a moment—when my State was reconstructed at the close of the war by its own citizens, by the voluntary action of its own people, I was opposed to all measures and methods of disfranchisement and disqualification which affected the masses because of participation in the rebellion.

I believed then, Mr. Chairman, and I believe now, that it not only was a mistake but was a piece of cruelty and absolute injustice when my State exerted its power to place upon all alike a badge of dishonor, not to say more, for participation in the rebellion. I always believed that it was wrong to place disqualification and disfranchisement upon those who had made common cause in what they were led to believe on that subject was right.

I believed, Mr. Chairman, when reconstruction took place, the great mass of the people who had attempted to take themselves out of the body-politic should be received back with open arms and welcome hands and generous hearts, and with all the emblems of full American citizenship. When the policy of fixing a badge of infamy on these people by disfranchisement and disqualification was consummated by the controlling authority in my State, under the leadership of that distinguished Democrat, Andrew Johnson, afterward a Democratic President of the United States, it was done against my will, and contrary to my judgment, and over my protest.

When this policy was consummated under the leadership of that distinguished Democrat, then military governor of Tennessee, I condemned it, and sought to point out some of the evils which soon afterward followed. And subsequent events, which so rapidly followed, proved that Mr. Johnson was wrong, and he afterward candidly admitted his error.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I stand to-day where I stood then on this question of political disabilities, and insist that politics, nor any questions growing out of the war, should have nothing whatever to do with forming any man's opinion or influencing his vote upon this bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. Fitz-John Porter was not charged with, tried for, nor convicted on the right or wrong of the rebellion. No, sir; his offense was not political—it was military. He was charged with, tried for, and convicted of a military offense—for the violation of orders and failure to discharge the duty of a soldier, and for the betrayal of his superior commander on one of the battlefields of the country. My whole nature, Mr. Chairman, revolts at, and I detest in my very soul, the idea of political disqualification, and I hope I will be pardoned for saying that if anything on earth could have made me a Democrat this policy of general disfranchisement and disqualification placed upon the people and other similar errors in the process of reconstruction would have driven me, as it did thousands and tens of thousands of others in the South, into that political party.

But, Mr. Chairman, I know you will excuse me for saying that I could not be a Democrat. I had studied the history, the traditions, and the tendencies of that party, and, in my deliberate opinion, they lead to evil and that continually, and therefore as a consequence, notwithstanding I differed with many of the leaders of my own party, differed with the distinguished gentleman who led this policy in Tennessee and forced it on the people, and afterward, as I have said, a Democratic President of the United States, I resolved to bear the ills by which I was surrounded in the Republican party rather than fly to those evils which I thought I saw hidden behind the banner of so-called conservatism—conservatism, I believe that is what you called it then—but which as I thought I saw, and as subsequent events have fully shown, was simply a banner behind which to hide the dangerous heresies of the old State rights' Democracy, from whence came all our national troubles and which led to evil and all our woes.

Mr. Chairman, for these reasons, I repeat, I determined to remain inside of and fight under my own party flag for the development of a true republican policy which would result ultimately in correcting these evils by breaking down, wiping out, and destroying all these badges of political disqualification and disfranchisement. And when the time came to destroy this odious policy in my State, when an opportunity was presented, when it was practicable to break it down I was among the first to do all and whatever I could, as some of my colleagues over there know, to break down, wipe out, and destroy the last vestige of this abnormal and inconsistent policy and restore the people to full American citizenship with all their rights, immunities, and privileges. Therefore, laying aside all diffidence, I have made these remarks that I was a somewhat conspicuous figure in re-enfranchising the rebels of my own State, and I will add that I have seen no substantial reason to regret my action in this direction. And since I have had the honor to occupy a seat in this House I have voted for every measure of amnesty, conciliation, and restoration of rights which has come before this body in behalf of those who were engaged in rebellion against the national authority.

Nor, Mr. Chairman, have I ever known or sought to know any party or the membership of any party when I came to cast my vote or to otherwise act in my representative capacity, except when voting or acting on some measure involving strictly political issues. Nor shall I inquire when I come to vote on this question as to the party to which Fitz-John Porter belongs, or make inquiry as to the membership of parties. There are few men living, Mr. Chairman, for whom I would not willingly vote a complete amnesty for all political offenses of whatever character they might be; and if this bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter were for this purpose, if it were intended to wipe out some badge of disqualification imposed for some political offense, it would have my earnest and hearty support. But I do not understand that such is the character of this measure. There is nothing in this bill, nor do its author or friends claim that it is, to affect any political question directly or indirectly in any way whatever.

I do not understand that Fitz-John Porter, or his friends for him, ask relief from any incumbrance or any badge of disqualification imposed for political considerations or any other; for whatever disqualifications were imposed by the court which tried and found him guilty have been expunged and wiped out by executive action and pardon. And while this bill is intended for his special and peculiar benefit, I do not understand that even his closest friends insist that he labors under any disability except that he is out of office. No, sir; so far as these disabilities could be reached by executive action they are gone, dissipated, expunged. But there is one remaining badge of disability, the disability of being out of office, and that is all—out of office, where most of us will soon be, I have no doubt, and some before we are ready, certainly before we are willing, to retire! Why, then, comes in this bill, thrust upon us when all his disabilities have been removed except that he is not given an office?

Mr. Chairman, I have been led to indulge in this line of thought, and to submit these reflections in reference to these political questions, because we see it printed in the newspapers and hear it whispered around the corridors of the Capitol and hotel lobbies that the rebels have been amnestied, and therefore this bill ought to pass for the benefit of Fitz-John Porter. But I think there is a difference between an open enemy and a secret, sullen foe. The one may be admired, while the other is despised, detested. The rebels were bold in an open and a bad cause, while Fitz-John Porter was the secret, sullen, inside foe to those who were engaged in a rightful cause.

Mr. Chairman, Fitz-John Porter was charged with and convicted of the highest offense known to military law; and now we have bills special, and bills general, all for the benefit of Fitz-John Porter. His friends, after struggling for more than twenty years to accomplish his glorification, through executive action and special legislation, have spread their legislative sails and enlarged the borders of their drag-net by forcing on our consideration a bill of a general and sweeping character, as well as this special bill, both now on the Calendar, and either of which, as I believe, if passed will open the way for the demoralization and the destruction of all discipline in the United States Army, as well as to violate the fundamental principles of our Government.

And the passage of this measure, Mr. Chairman, is demanded on the single issue of moral justice and legal right. Its passage is demanded on the moral justice involved in the principles of right and wrong. That is the ground on which its passage is urged.

Fitz-John Porter's guilt is vehemently denied and his innocence is as persistently asserted. Thus the issue has been made up ever since the fatal day on which he was charged and afterward found guilty of betraying his superior commander in a death struggle on one of the battlefields of the nation.

No, Mr. Chairman, there is no question here of pardon, of mercy, of amnesty; but it is a square issue fairly and clearly made up of treachery of the boldest and blackest and most infamous character on the one hand, and that of simple and plain devotion to duty and of obedience to orders on the other. Twist it as you may, turn it as you can, this is the square issue on which we have to vote. And, as I have already said—I will repeat it again—that he was charged with and convicted of the highest offense known to the law of nations; that he was charged with the crime of refusing to march to the aid of his superior officer, who at that hour was engaged in a death struggle for victory with a superior force of the enemy. I want to call the attention of the House and the country to the important results that depended upon that struggle; to the fact that in that struggle on that day was involved, if not the life of the Republic itself, at least a prolongation of the war to an indefinite period, and the lives of thousands of brave and true men.

Oh, but there is controversy as to the time at which he received orders to move his command. What right had he to wait for orders when he saw the necessity for his help? What right had he as a soldier to stand there posing upon the red-tape process of orders? Let us suppose, Mr. Chairman, if it be possible, that there had been no Fitz-John Porter that day, and that the gallant Phil Sheridan had been in command of that corps, would "Little Phil" have waited for orders before he rushed into the thickest of the fight to turn the tide of battle and have victory perched on his banner and put your rebel brigades to flight? No, sir; but the testimony in this case does show—and I am only going to deal with the testimony incidentally—that Porter did have orders to move on that day, but, as I believe, from reading the record and studying the history of that transaction, he deliberately chose to disobey those orders and refused to move his command; not as a traitor in the sense of a disunionist—not that he desired to see the Southern confederacy succeed. I do not believe he desired to see the stars and bars floating over an independent government on this portion of the American continent. I do not believe he was a rebel in the sense of a disunionist; but from this testimony I do believe he was a traitor to and for the purpose of betraying, disgracing, and humiliating his superior commander, Maj. Gen. John Pope, whom he hated. He was so loyal to Little Mac, and disloyal to Pope, that he permitted it to sway his action at the peril of his country.

I say, Mr. Chairman, and I wish I could utter it with a voice that could be heard from one end of this country to the other, if Fitz-John Porter was guilty, as I believe he was, he ought—and I say it with the utmost deliberation—he ought to have received a much severer punishment than that which was inflicted upon him. If guilty, Fitz-John Porter ought to have been shot. If innocent, there would have been neither a demand nor any necessity for any court-martial. If guilty, he ought to have been shot; and if he had been some humble private soldier under precisely the same circumstances, surrounded as he was, excepting his rank and social influences, he would have been shot. If innocent, he ought to have been acquitted—he would have been acquitted—but if guilty, as a court-martial found that he was, this bill ought not to pass even though Congress had full power and control over the subject.

Mr. Chairman, this is rather a long exordium and laying down of premises, but I now propose to group together as briefly as possible the reasons why I shall vote against this bill when put on its passage. And, first of all, we are now asked to take a new departure in the science of government, and turn Congress into an appellate tribunal to review and set aside what I believe under our system of government was a carefully considered and deliberately pronounced judicial decision. This I do not believe Congress has the right or the power to do. I do not believe Congress has such power under the Constitution; and if it has, it will be a dangerous exercise of power to pass this bill by which in the course of time all such cases would be transferred from the forum of courts-martial with their judicial poise to the political arena of Congress, thus making the decisions of every military court in the process of time dependent upon the varying fortunes and changing scenes of political parties.

I know it has been said that this is a reflection upon all the honest members of Congress. I disclaim the purpose or intention to make any such reflection. But I appeal to every intelligent man if we have not seen almost every question that comes into these halls take political direction and receive a political turn and become subject to political influence? I will not stop to intimate that this has any politics about it. Of course not. Fitz-John Porter is not a political issue. Oh, no! Not at all!

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question.

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir, if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Did not one of the most distinguished generals in the Army state in the last Congress, when he was pleading for Fitz-John Porter, that Congress was unable to try this case, that it did not understand it, and had not the power to understand it?

Mr. HOUK. I expect if he was a good lawyer and a good general he did so state, because I am satisfied there is no such power in Congress; and, as I think I can show, it is impossible to now understand the case as well as it was understood by those dealing with it at the time; but I am coming to that more fully directly.

Courts-martial, Mr. Chairman, as I conceive—and I call the attention of every lawyer in the House to what I am about to say—courts-martial, as I conceive, are founded and grounded in the very genius of our Government and all that is essential to its integrity, and in case of rebellion and war even more so than the civil courts, by whose conservatism, learning, and wise adjudications liberty is preserved to and for the people.

And as to the character, jurisdiction, and powers of courts-martial, the Constitution of the United States and the decisions of the Supreme Court place those tribunals, military courts, as a distinct and specific arm of the Government, fixed and immovable in their sphere, and with whose jurisdiction and findings no other branch of the Government has any right, power, or authority to interfere except by the exercise of that co-ordinate authority which is conferred by the provisions of the Constitution for this purpose on the Executive alone.

By the fifth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States it is declared that—

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except—> except in cases arising in the land or naval forces.

Mark the language.

And says Mr. Benet, a high authority on this question:

> The Constitution, therefore, while expressly empowering Congress to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces, expressly excepts the trial of cases arising in the land or naval service from the ordinary provisions of law.

Did not Fitz-John Porter's case arise in the land service? Is it not one of the cases which the Constitution itself expressly excepts and transfers from the civil courts, and gives jurisdiction over to courts-martial? What are the ordinary provisions of law, and what does the Constitution mean by expressly excepting cases arising in the land and naval forces from those provisions of law? There was and there could be but one purpose contemplated by the framers of this constitutional provision, this inhibition and exception bearing directly upon the jurisdiction of courts-martial, and that purpose was and is to give to those courts absolute and exclusive jurisdiction to try and determine, pronounce judgment of acquittal or of guilt, and affix punishment in such cases, and to make the action of a court-martial, when concluded and executed according to the law governing such proceedings, final and beyond the reach or interference or review of any other tribunal or branch of the Government except the executive, as prescribed by the Constitution and the laws. And accordingly, says the same high authority already quoted—oh, ye constitutional sticklers, listen to what this high authority says—"No doubt" [there is not even a single doubting

Thomas!]—"no doubt is intimated in any of the books of our law as to the competency and completeness of the jurisdiction of courts-martial in the cases and under the conditions provided by the Articles of War."

Fitz-John Porter was tried by and convicted in strict accordance with the laws of Congress and the Articles of War made in pursuance of laws enacted under this provision of the Constitution, and the findings and judgment of the tribunal that tried and convicted him are conclusive against all other departments of the Government, except in so far as the Executive may have interfered by the exercise of his clemency, or may hereafter interpose his Executive power—this deduction by this high authority is unanswerable. It is too clear—too logical! Absolutely conclusive of this case! There is no answer to it.

Courts, Mr. Chairman, whether civil or military, are the guide-boards to human liberty. All that we have and all that we are depend upon loyalty to their decrees when pronounced according to law. Life, liberty, property, the pursuit of happiness, all depend in large and peculiar measure on the reverence and respect paid to the decrees of the courts of the country. And that people are governed the wisest and the best where the largest degree of respect and reverence and veneration is given to the decrees of the judiciary when pronounced according to law. And, Mr. Chairman, according to the view which I take of this question, if it is competent for Congress to overthrow, either directly or indirectly, by one means or another, the findings and judgment of a court-martial, it is equally competent for Congress in its legislative capacity, in the exercise of the same authority, to step in and take jurisdiction and overthrow and annul and destroy the effect of the judgment of any other judicial tribunal, either civil or military.

This conclusion, Mr. Chairman, seems to me to be supported by both logic and sound law, and such a principle once established would be absolutely destructive of the very fabric of government itself. And does not the question come up and meet us right here, does it not stare us squarely in the face—the question whether the United States is a government of co-ordinate departments, legislative, executive, and judicial, constituting a unity in trinity, each department independent in its own sphere; or whether it is a government in which the supreme power is vested in the Congress, or a government in which the supreme power is vested in the legislative department, subject only to the approval of the Executive? To establish and recognize such a principle in government would be to blot out the courts of the country, destroy their power, and erect here in the national capital a legislative despotism subject only to the Executive.

May it not be inquired, Mr. Chairman, and will not the people inquire, whether or not it is possible in this Government of co-ordinate departments, with checks and balances intended to give equilibrium to the whole, that, after one recognized and constitutional branch of the judiciary has pronounced judgment, under the law, in a case involving facts ascertained in accordance with the rules of law, Congress has the power and can reach out and take further jurisdiction of the same subject-matter between the same parties and thus act upon and readjudicate and reverse judgment and dispose again of the very same question? That strikes at the very foundation of the whole superstructure of our national authority, and I insist that the idea of such a power existing in Congress is supremely absurd and makes what should be a consistent and harmonious whole a jumble of confusion, uncertainty, and disorder.

Let me recall attention to the structure of our Government. Of the three co-ordinate departments the judicial is put last in the order of their creation by the Constitution, thus clearly signifying that those two are to rest on this one, which is designed to interpret the law and enforce its mandates in obedience to those acts which have been approved by the Executive after originating with the legislative under its constitutional authority, as the first of the three co-ordinate departments. In other words, the intendment of the Constitution was and is that these co-ordinate departments shall harmonize in the government of the country and that neither shall invade or trench upon the jurisdiction of the other.

The Constitution authorizes, and our laws provide for, courts-martial, as I have already shown, as clearly and definitely as they do for civil courts, and if Congress can reach out, take hold of, and readjudicate every question which may be disposed of by a court-martial it may do the same with the judgments and decrees of every civil court in the land, including the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Constitution granted the power; Congress exercised it by the enactment of laws establishing courts-martial. The Executive approved those laws enacted under the authority of the Constitution, and thereby there was set in motion the machinery of the Government by which to adjudicate all military disputes and to punish military offenses. Our Supreme Court has decided time and again that when all the powers of the Government have been exercised there is no way to recall the decision and act upon the question again.

Mr. LONG. Does the gentleman understand that to authorize the President to appoint Fitz-John Porter to this place is to set aside the finding of that court?

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir, to that extent. It will be remembered that the only part of the decree now remaining in force is that which dropped Fitz-John Porter from office, and he has never got back. Now, this bill proposes to overturn that decision so far as to put Fitz-John Porter in again. That is all there is of it; and to that extent it is a direct, unequivocal invasion of the judicial rights of courts-martial. [Applause.] It is possible that if there was an existing vacancy in the Army the President might further exercise his executive power and legally appoint Fitz-John Porter to it. But for Congress to pass a law providing for his restoration with the rank and pay he had when dismissed will be a direct reversal of the findings and sentence of the court-martial and an invasion of the rights of a co-ordinate department of the Government. As I conceive, there is one difference, and but one, between the judgment and decree of a civil court and that of a court-martial. That difference is not in the binding effect to be given to the decision of the one or the other; the only difference is as to the time, the manner, and the process of execution of the decision and the different machinery that enforces it.

But civil courts—and this is a portion of my answer to the gentleman—civil courts are to maintain order throughout the whole body politic, to preserve the well being of the social and civil affairs of all the people for all time; while courts-martial are for the discipline and enforcement of military orders and the exaction of obedience on the part of those who have adopted the profession of arms and to whom the whole people are to look (as they looked to Fitz-John Porter on that fatal day) for protection in times of commotion and public danger. The functions and purposes of civil courts are for the redress of wrongs and the administration of justice as applicable to one phase of human affairs in civil society and universal citizenship. The functions and purposes of courts-martial are to enforce and apply the same principles to a wholly different condition of affairs and to exact duty and obedience on the part of the soldier toward the sovereign whom he serves, and whom Fitz-John Porter ought to have obeyed. Both these classes of courts are supreme in their sphere, and subject only to the constitutional exercise of the respective powers lodged in the co-ordinate branches of the Government.

But in this case Congress is asked to "swing around the circle" by going back and undoing that which, as I have shown, has had the sanction of itself and the other two co-ordidate departments of the Government. Congress is now asked to annul and set aside a judicial decision pronounced under and founded upon laws of its own making, thus claiming the right—and I invite gentlemen to observe how dangerous a principle this is to interweave into the fabric of the nation—thus claiming the right to keep alive every issue of both law and fact which may arise at any time between the Government and the individual. It is a kind of governmental "perpetual motion."

The law of Congress and the organization of these military courts provide their mode of procedure, and subject their findings to the approval of the Executive; as I insist, both as President of the United States in his civil capacity and as the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the nation. The approval of the President, as it seems to me, must necessarily partake both of the nature of a civil and a military act; and when the findings and judgment of a military court are thus approved it is a completely executed authority. The power has gone; the jurisdiction is lost; the adjudication becomes fixed and final, and the matter involved is beyond the control of Congress or any other tribunal, except the review and action by the Executive under the same constitutional authority that gave the other two branches of the Government their power over the subject but which have thus been exhausted.

The genius of our Government and the spirit of the people are such that the military is held in subjection to the civil authority, even in the exercise of official acts by the President, who is Commander-in-Chief of the Army by reason of being the chief civil officer of the United States; and his approval of the finding and sentence of a court-martial is in the double capacity of both civil and military chief; and after that there is no power in the law or under the Constitution to reach out and take jurisdiction of the same subject-matter again.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CAREY. If I can be recognized at this time I will yield fifteen minutes of my hour to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK]—

Mr. HOUK. Oh, give me a little more than that.

Mr. CAREY. And I will reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. BRAGG. There is no objection to giving the gentleman from Tennessee all the time he desires; but it must come out of the time allowed under the order of the House to the opponents of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming Territory [Mr. CAREY] is recognized as entitled to the floor, and yields fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CAREY. And I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, this provision of the Constitution requiring the approval of the Executive, both in his capacity as civil magistrate and as Commander-in-Chief, is one of the wisest and most wholesome provisions of that instrument. But in the case of Fitz-John Porter, which this and other measures are intended to affect, the military court was not only legally organized, but it consisted of a membership distinguished for ability, learning, and integrity of character. Mr. Chairman, it would be difficult indeed, if not almost impossible, to organize a court more competent to administer justice tempered with mercy than the court which tried and convicted Fitz-John Porter. General Garfield, one of its members, as we all know, was noted for his kindly and generous disposition, amounting to a beneficence of soul which led him to err, if at all, always on the side of mercy. He was a double-breasted, noble-souled, big-hearted character, with a penetrating and analytical mind, never imposed on in the interest of wrong and oppression, as the friends of Fitz-John Porter now insist. Almost—perhaps quite as much might be said of all the other members of the court who brought in the verdict against Fitz-John Porter as guilty of the high crime and misdemeanor with which he was charged.

But suppose it were true, that a mistake was made, is it not, under our Constitution and laws, one of those incidents in the affairs of mankind, under the imperfections of the human race, which necessarily inhere to all human governments, and for which there is no remedy?

There are cases, Mr. Chairman, which pass beyond the jurisdiction of governmental remedy, and enter the domain of impossibilities.

While I do not believe it to be true, yet the fact may be conceded, for the sake of argument, that injustice was done in the trial of the case. But I can see no remedy here, for the reason that all the force and power of the Government have been exercised and exhausted, and there is now no means whereby the case can be turned about and begun over again at the other end, or whereby any new trial can take place.

If injustice were done in this case, in my judgment there is no power to legislate for the correction of the evil, because all men must admit the impolicy, not to say the impossibility, of keeping the powers of the Government constantly in motion, moving in a circle, acting and reacting, trying and retrying the same question between the same parties continually.

Let me ask what will be the effect of giving legislative recognition to the principle of the Schofield board? If one Executive can appoint a commission, and clothe it with power to reverse the decision and finding of a court-martial, can not another Executive, holding a different view, appoint another commission to review and place the verdict of the court-martial in statu quo, to restore it, and so keep every case of a like character going up and down, according to the changing opinion of the man who happens to be President of the United States at the time?

Thus it is clear to my mind, Mr. Chairman, that the only basis for consistent action in such a case and in order to secure a stable government is to treat the decision of a military court, after approval by the President, just as the decisions of civil courts are treated, by recognizing their binding force in all cases of final adjudication and approval by the President. And to pass any bill, whether special or general, for the purpose of granting the proposed relief in the case of Fitz-John Porter is to do violence to fundamental rules of government and set at defiance stern and necessary principles of law, the absolute and imperative observance of which is essential to the very existence of government itself. I therefore insist that to overthrow these fundamental rules and lay violent hands on these essential principles would be the very essence of rebellion, as flagrant in character, as injurious in effect, though wanting in animus, as that with which Fitz-John Porter is charged in the disobedience of orders and the violation of the duty of a soldier by the betrayal of his superior officer.

But passing from this particular view of the case, as founded on the nature and legal character of a military court, let us examine this case in another aspect and apply another question of law to the proceedings and findings of the court-martial to see whether there is any reason why we shall undo that which was done by that court-martial. It is a recognized principle of law in all the courts of the country, practiced every day, a principle amounting to the force of positive enactment, if you please, that the court which tries a case, seeing the parties, observing the witnesses, looking the accused and accuser in the face, taking cognizance of the actions and demeanor of all interested and concerned, is better prepared to judge of the force of facts and weight of evidence, and better able to decide as to the guilt or innocence of one charged with crime than those who did not have like means of judging. Then when we add to the advantages of the court in this case another great fact, intimately associated with the verdict and judgment in the case of Fitz-John Porter, the fact that Mr. Lincoln, as President, examined and approved the finding of the court, there is absolutely no ground for supposing any injustice was done. And I say we should be very careful while exculpating the living not to inculpate the dead—that we should be careful while restoring Fitz-John Porter to the Army not to condemn Mr. Lincoln, who approved the sentence, and Mr. Garfield and the other members of the court which found him guilty. I for one would not do so even though I believed Congress had full power over the subject, unless there was the most complete, conclusive, and absolute certainty of the fact, borne out by the most unquestionable evidence.

To restore Fitz-John Porter to the Army is to condemn Mr. Lincoln and all those who declared his guilt and sanctioned his punishment, and while physical numbers may pass this bill here, of one thing I feel assured, and that is that the great majority of the American people who rejoiced at the downfall of the rebellion will never believe otherwise than that he was guilty as charged before and found by the court-martial.

Where is the man who can believe that Mr. Lincoln, whose nobleness of character and kindness of heart will live forever, would have sanctioned such a great and monstrous wrong as the advocates of this bill proclaim was laid upon Fitz-John Porter by the court which tried him and in the approval of the sentence of that court by the President, Mr. Lincoln?

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, who believes Mr. Lincoln to have been capable of sanctioning and sanctifying such a grievous wrong by his approval of that sentence? Such a thing lies very near the border-line of the impossibilities, and I do not believe Mr. Lincoln perpetrated that wrong. He was a good man; careful and faithful in the discharge of every duty which devolved upon him. He was a great man—one of the greatest, as I believe, in the entire history of the human race. He was the one man—the one man whose genius and goodness blended and stood forth in brightness and glory far above all his fellows, whose wisdom shed its light far above all those who had preceded or have since followed him in the administration of the Government and in the dispensation of mercy to his kind.

Mr. Lincoln was more than a genius. He was, as I believe, an instrument in the hands and peculiarly a child of Providence with a great mission to perform. I do not say, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Lincoln never made a mistake. I do not say that he was incapable of committing an error. He may at some time, somewhere, and some way have perpetrated a blunder. But I do say that he possessed a great mind, a marvelously keen perception, an accurate, an almost perfect judgment; a good heart, big with benevolence; that he was supremely just in all his ways, and that he was wholly incapable of erring intentionally.

Indeed, so far as I know, or have ever heard, if he erred at all it was on the side of mercy; and when I associate the names of the distinguished gentlemen composing the court-martial that tried and convicted Fitz-John Porter, and see the more distinguished name of Lincoln, who approved the findings and sentence of that court, I can not, I do not believe that a mistake was made. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that these men misunderstood the facts with which they dealt.

I do not believe they misapplied the law or the testimony, or in any wise misjudged the case when they pronounced Fitz-John Porter guilty of the great crime with which he was charged. But now, after the lapse of more than twenty years—yea, when almost a quarter of a century has passed away, when Lincoln and Garfield and all those who found him guilty and approved his sentence at the time are dead and gone from human eyes, I for one, Mr. Chairman—for one before I vote to restore Fitz-John Porter to the Army, and wipe out that verdict and thereby transfer the brand and badge of disgrace imposed by that court from the guilty to the innocent, there must be absolutely convincing proof of the right to ask it and the power of Congress to grant it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I would like a very few minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed to the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I have been here for seven years and I have troubled the House scarcely as much as seven hours in speech-making in all of that time. I can finish what I have to say in ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I hope unanimous consent will be given, if no one is ready to speak upon the other side, to allow the gentleman from Tennessee to go on and finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] is ready to proceed this evening.

Mr. WOLFORD. I am ready to go on.

Mr. HOUK. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will consent that I may proceed now.

Mr. WOLFORD. I have no objection, but it must not be taken out of my time.

Mr. HOUK. Not by any means out of the gentleman's time, but by consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no power in reference to the matter.

Mr. HOUK. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to go on for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BRAGG. I must object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming was recognized and yielded fifteen minutes of his time to the gentleman from Tennessee. That time has expired.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But the gentleman asks unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But the Chair might submit the question at least to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will do so.

Mr. HOUK. Before that is done let me say again, Mr. Chairman, that I have been here for seven years and have scarcely yet occupied as much as seven hours of the time of the House on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee be permitted to continue his remarks for a few minutes longer.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do hope that this courtesy, so frequently accorded to gentlemen upon the other side, will be granted to the gentleman from Tennessee, when everybody knows that there will be no debate after his speech is concluded this evening. It occurs to me that it would be a gracious courtesy to permit him to proceed for ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BRAGG. We have already extended the time of one gentleman for one hour without taking it out of the time allowed for debate on that side. Now, if there is any more time to be extended it must come out of the time allowed for debate on that side.

Mr. HOUK. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin what harm will it do to permit me to go on for a few minutes when we are about to adjourn anyway?

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] has three-quarters of an hour left.

Mr. CAREY. But I have given it away.

Mr. BRAGG. Then let the gentlemen you have given it to give up some of their time.

Mr. CANNON. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin afraid of this discussion?

Mr. BRAGG. I am not afraid of the discussion, but I am reminded of the old couplet of what the devil would be when he was sick; how sweet you are now and how different it is when we want an extension of time.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's remark is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. CAREY. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK].

Mr. HOUK. I was trying to say, when the hammer fell, in view of the circumstances of the trial and the character of the men who found him guilty and approved the sentence, even though I believed Congress possessed the power over this subject, to be induced to vote for this bill I would require to have the most convincing proof to show where the wrong lay and that all these men were in the wrong. But I feel, from an examination of the record and the proof in this case, that no such evidence has been presented, no such new and reliable testimony has been adduced with all the expedients of admiring friends, with high social surroundings and energetic and persistent agitation of more than twenty years trying to find something to overturn this court-martial and its decisions. All this attempt has utterly failed.

And I want to ask, gentlemen, is there a lawyer here that does not know how recollection fades, how memory becomes obscured by time, and how facts and details are wiped out and lost as testimony by time and age and circumstances surrounding parties who depose? And I want to ask every lawyer—the lawyers on the other side of this case—if it is not a fact, recognized so far that even the newspapers of the country are constantly criticising the fact, that the mere continuance of a criminal case is considered more than half the battle even though the offense charged be murder? Why is this true? It is simply because of the very fact that I have suggested, that facts and details going to make up evidence are better understood and the truth more certainly ascertained while the occurrences of which the parties testify are fresh in the memories of the witness deposing to the transactions.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that it is an utter impossibility to arrive at as reliable a conclusion as to this or any other like case now after almost a quarter of a century has elapsed as that which was reached immediately after the incidents transpired on which this proceeding was based. I lay it down as one of the self-evident truths of intellectual philosophy that it is absolutely impossible that any human testimony can be as reliable after the lapse of twenty years as it was immediately after the transactions took place of which the witness testified. Every tyro in the practice of the law and experience of the courts knows this to be true. There is no exception to the rule. It is founded in the nature and constitution of the human intellect. It applies to all alike though it may not be equal in degree; to the strong as well as the weak, the great as well as the small, the rich as well as the poor; it applies to every class of the human family that as time grows memory fades. Therefore even if I believed Congress had the full and plenary power in this matter I would vote against this bill, and thereby sustain Lincoln and Garfield and those who rendered judgment of guilty against Fitz-John Porter, when the facts were fresh in the minds of the witnesses, the court, and those who then dealt with the case.

But it is said, and I suppose it will be repeated continually, that other competent judges have reconsidered and reversed their views touching the findings of this court-martial and as to Fitz-John Porter's guilt. We are constantly cited to the Schofield board to offset the verdict of Garfield and Lincoln and those who found him guilty and approved the sentence. While I will not attempt to discuss the action of that board, while I will not stop to compare the men and motives of the Schofield board with the court-martial which tried and convicted Fitz-John Porter, I will venture to make one remark. I am reminded of a striking epigram by a brilliant Tennesseean, Emerson Etheridge. He had been tried about the close of the war for some supposed seditious conduct. In speaking of it Etheridge said the court-martial was first organized to convict, and then ordered to try. The same remark would probably apply, if reversed, to the Schofield board. It seems to have been first organized to acquit, and then ordered to try.

But while I will not discuss the facts of this case—I have purposely abstained from going into the testimony except incidentally—yet right here I want to make one remark on a statement by this Schofield board which I think is a clear giving away of themselves. They based their action in finding Fitz-John Porter not guilty on the assumed fact that there was no battle near Groveton on the 29th, and yet in their own report, like boys giving themselves away, they state that officers of both armies, both Union and rebel, did report and did believe there was a battle fought there on that day. Think of it. They acquitted Fitz-John Porter because there was no battle, and then they turn about and in the same document say all the Union and rebel officers report there was a battle. And still this Schofield board, in order to acquit this officer, denies that a battle was fought on the 29th, when official reports, and statements, and records of generals on both sides show the Union Army lost more men in the battle of the 29th than the United States lost in the war with Mexico, by which was acquired enough territory to make an empire and add twelve or fifteen States to the Union. The records show more men were lost on the 29th than on the 30th, and yet this board, by some new process of reasoning, came to the conclusion there was no battle fought on that day. And this was all for the benefit of Fitz-John Porter.

But we are told that others have changed their minds as to Fitz-John Porter's guilt, and I readily admit that a very few have changed their position on this question. One whom I loved while living, and whose memory I revere now that he is dead, did certainly change his mind in reference to the truth of this matter.

But let us look for a moment and examine the circumstances under which these utterances of a change of mind thus have been made, and ascertain if possible how far they should influence us in reaching a just and logical conclusion in the premises.

Let us come up with all our devotion not only to heroes but to principles and right, and see how far General Grant's change of opinion should reach out and justify us in changing our conclusions. The truth is, I have heard General Grant quoted so much recently in certain ways and by certain parties and for certain purposes that I am constantly reminded of the devil quoting Scripture to sustain his cause. [Laughter.] But what if General Grant did change his opinion? Let us philosophize for a moment. Did you ever know a good man who did not, in his declining years, undergo a change of mind and take on a mental habit of disbelieving everything bad of anybody whomsoever? As age moves upon us nature softens us all, until all good men seek to excuse if not to acquit the most guilty. And especially is this true as age and irresponsibility remove a man out of the channels of active life, where the stern demands of justice require action, and assert their prerogatives. Change of position and responsibility has much to do with men's actions, and especially their utterances. As a man reaches the stage of life where age comes upon him, he naturally is unwilling to believe anything bad of anybody. But what are the facts of history in this case?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] has expired.

Mr. PETERS. I have an hour in opposition to the bill, and, if it is in order, I will yield out of that hour whatever time the gentleman from Tennessee desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] can not be recognized now for that purpose; but if what he proposes can be done by unanimous consent the Chair sees no objection.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, the time fixed by the special order of the House for closing this debate is 3 o'clock p. m. on Thursday next. The utmost time allowed for debate upon both sides, under the order, is fifteen hours, and every minute that is yielded further beyond the regular time of members will be simply putting members of the committee in a corner.

Mr. HOUK. Well, Mr. Chairman, what do I understand? That I am cut off?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] was speaking in the time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. The Chair can not control that time.

Mr. HOUK (to Mr. CAREY). Give me three minutes more.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUK. I thank the gentleman. I must hurry on. What do the facts of history show in regard to General Grant's connection with this case of Fitz-John Porter? He had it on his mind; he had full knowledge of it; he acted upon it when he was General of the Army, and when he was responsible for its discipline; he had full knowledge of it at the time when one stroke of his pen would have accomplished wonders; he acted on it as President of the United States; he acted on it when he had the responsibility for the discipline of the Army and the welfare of the whole people of this grand country which he had saved resting upon him; and yet for seventeen long years in his official capacity he proclaimed the guilt of Fitz-John Porter.

I know that General Grant did very much to build up the sentiment behind this bill, which is now about to force it through Congress, thus making a martyr and a hero, in so far as such a thing is possible, out of a man who, if he had belonged to the rebel army and betrayed it, or if he had been a private soldier in the ranks of the army that he was convicted of betraying, or if he had been some common person void of high social surroundings and influences, would have been shot. If he had been a private soldier he would have been shot and long since forgotten. In one respect at least he would have been like Moses of old: No man here or elsewhere would have ever known where he was buried. But he was not a private soldier; he was not shot, and Congress is now in the act of crowning him with honors.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose that my three minutes have about expired. Why, sir, there is a field here that I could occupy for a week, showing that this man ought to be shot instead of being promoted. But I leave it. I want to say, however, in conclusion, that for the past seven years, ever since I first entered this Hall and took my seat down there by the side of Garfield when he was engaged in the preparation of a speech on this subject, I have been studying this record, and, while I do not base my vote on the facts but on the constitutional and legal grounds I have stated, yet I do believe that the facts in this case show that Fitz-John Porter was guilty. Not that he wanted to betray the Union as a government, but he wanted the rebellion put down according to the Democratic idea, so that when reconstruction took place the Democratic party could have the credit of reconstructing the Union and could continue in power, as they had been during three-quarters of the existence of the Government. Moved by this impulse and by hatred and treachery and disloyalty to his chief commander, Maj. Gen. John Pope, he willfully and deliberately, as I believe the proofs show, violated his orders, disobeyed them, refused to march, and permitted trouble and disaster to befall our arms on that day with the view and for the purpose of a rebel victory, which would force reconstruction on the Democratic plan of giving the South all they demanded. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WOLFORD. If the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] who has just closed his able and powerful argument is right in his views of the Constitution, then, sir, we are in a bad condition. The gentleman claims—and I want the attention of my Republican friends to this—the gentleman claims that if Fitz-John Porter had been innocent, as innocent as an angel in heaven, but had been convicted by a court-martial, and the finding of that tribunal had been signed by the President of the United States, no power on earth could save him! Do you believe it, sir? Is there a lawyer in this House who believes it? Do you tell me that this glorious Government of ours which protects every right, which goes down to the lowest condition of humanity and mounts to the highest, and protects every man and every individual—do you tell me that its power is thus easily exhausted? The President can pardon only to a certain extent. Congress has no power, you say. Then where is the power? There is no court of appeals to which you can go for relief from the decision of a court-martial. Thus you have the position—I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] will pardon me when I say you have the absurd position taken that in such a case as I have stated there is no remedy. Innocence must suffer, must be blasted, and the world must see that all the boasted liberty and all the boasted grandeur and all the boasted power of this American Republic is a sham.

A monarch could save an innocent man under such circumstances; the "Autocrat of all the Russias" could save him; there is no despotism on earth that could not save an innocent man in such a case, except the free and powerful Government of the United States! Do you believe it? Will my friend from Tennessee, when he gets over the excitement into which he has wrought himself for the purpose of this argument—will he, as a lawyer, contend that that is a fair and clear conclusion from the Constitution of the United States? Then it ought to be amended. If that is the effect of our boasted Constitution, to what sort of a predicament are we reduced? Will you ever boast again that you have the freest and best Government upon earth? Any man who indorses such a doctrine as that stultifies the founders of the Constitution, and sinks our Government beneath the level of all the governments of the earth. If that be a correct view of our Government, then instead of its being the grandest, the most glorious, the most humane, the most merciful government that ever was devised by the wisdom of man, you declare it insignificant and puny—a government under which error and despotism and crime prevail over innocence and liberty and truth; and there is no remedy!

I propose to-night to lay merely the foundation of an argument on this question; and I hope I may get the attention of those gentlemen who are influenced by prejudice on this subject; for nothing but prejudice against Fitz-John Porter could have caused this otherwise clear-minded man to have made such an argument as we have just heard.

In the first place, I must remark that the gentleman is mistaken in his proposition that a court-martial is a part of the intelligent judiciary of the country. I was once a constitutional lawyer—and I hope I have not forgotten all my knowledge in that capacity—yet, as I listened to the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, I began to doubt whether all that I have been taught as to the principles of our Constitution was not rank error. I said to myself, "Great God! must all the principles of the law which I have been taught go for nothing under the strong demonstration of the gentleman from Tennessee?"

Now, I want to call attention to a fundamental mistake which the gentleman makes at the outstart. There are, he says—and in this he is undoubtedly correct—three departments of the Government—the legislative, executive, and judicial. Now, does the gentleman dare to say, in the face of the Constitution, that a court-martial is a part of the judiciary? Any man who will read the Constitution of the United States must see where the judicial power of this Government resides. That power is vested in the Supreme Court and such other civil courts as Congress may from time to time establish.

Some of the propositions embraced in the gentleman's arguments I might admit, for he has so interwoven false propositions and true ones that I doubt whether he could get his own bearings unless he had a compass. [Laughter.]

Now I wish to refer to some of the powers of Congress; and I may dwell further on this question when I take the floor again. The Constitution provides—bear in mind these are powers of the legislative department—that Congress shall "raise and support armies;" shall "provide and maintain a navy;" shall "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Now, do you tell me that when Congress is thus vested with power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, this same Congress has no power to change or modify those rules and regulations? According to the argument of my distinguished friend from Tennessee we are in the position of the ancient heathen: we can make an idol, and then we must fall down and worship it. After you have organized a court-martial, you can never change it; you can never modify it; you can never control it; your power ceases; it is your god, and you must worship it! Now, do you believe that? Gentlemen who intend to vote against the restoration of Fitz-John Porter, let me ask you, for the sake of your own intelligence, not to stultify yourselves by placing your votes on such a ground as that.

Congress having the power under the Constitution to make rules and regulations for the government of the land and naval forces, it is under that power Congress has established the Rules and Articles of War—the military code under which the Army acts. If it were a civil court that had condemned a man, do you tell me there would be no power to save him? Why, I know that you are all ashamed to be placed by your orator in such a position as that.

I do not propose to go further in this constitutional argument just now. I will only remark that the whole argument against Fitz-John Porter has changed since the last Congress. My distinguished friend from Indiana (Mr. STEELE) has taken the ground that Porter was not a traitor to his country. I thank him for that. He takes the ground that Porter did desire his country to conquer, did desire its armies to be victorious. My friend from Tennessee, following in the same argument, holds that Porter was not a traitor to his country, but a traitor to — what? A traitor to Pope! Great God! do we live in a land of law, in a land of light, in a Christian country, where learned and distinguished men will say that treason to a man is a crime to be punished? Were we the subjects of a king, a ruler sanctified by the maxim that "the king can do no wrong," the remark might have some application. But in this free country there can be no treason to a man. The whole idea is wrong, and goes upon a wrong principle.

I do not propose to go this evening at length in arguing that proposition. I hold gentlemen to the ground they have taken.

"But," said the distinguished gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], "we know that he desired the triumph of our armies." But, oh, what a bloody traitor he was! Oh, how he made our armies suffer! Now, I propose before I am through with this investigation, if you will only hear me and give me your attention, to demonstrate there was not a human life lost——

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman yield to me to move that the committee rise?

Mr. WOLFORD. I will with pleasure, on the condition that I shall retain the floor and resume my remarks when this subject is up again for discussion.

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. EDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, a bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and had come to no resolution thereon.

TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TUCKER. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move by unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the purpose of putting it on its passage this evening. It is necessary to do so for the purpose of giving to the Treasurer of the United States the power, in the event of the absence or illness of either the assistant treasurer or himself, the Treasurer, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, to appoint from among the clerks in the Treasury any one of said clerks to be acting assistant treasurer during such absence or illness.

Mr. BURROWS. Is this a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does it involve any additional expenditure?

Mr. TUCKER. It does not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EDEN in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia on the part of the Committee on the Judiciary that the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be taken from the House Calendar and put on its passage at this time?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 304. The Treasurer may, in his discretion, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the assistant treasurer to act in the place and discharge any or all the duties of the Treasurer of the United States; and in the event of the absence or illness of either the assistant treasurer or himself, the Treasurer, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, may appoint from among the clerks in the Treasury any one of said clerks to be acting assistant treasurer during such absence or illness: Provided, however, That the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases. Such acting officer shall, moreover, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct in like cases of the assistant treasurer, respectively, for whom he acts."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. SPRIGGS, for five days, to attend the funeral of Hon. Horatio Seymour

To Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, for ten days, to attend to important legal business.

To Mr. LANDES, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. ERMENTROUT, until Wednesday next, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. BRAGG (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 15, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

INDIAN INSPECTOR HENRY WARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior; which was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, February 13, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution of the 5th instant in words as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all papers which have been filed in the Interior Department, and of all papers which have been presented to any officer of that Department, touching the official and personal conduct of Henry Ward, Indian inspector, during his continuance in said office."

I transmit all the official papers on file in the Department which I understand to be embraced by the resolution.

The official reports made to this Department by Henry Ward as United States Indian inspector are voluminous, and as the clerical force of this Department is limited and otherwise fully employed, I have deemed it best to transmit the original reports. As they are frequently consulted in the transaction of the business of the Department, I have the honor to request that they be returned to its files as soon as they are no longer required by the Senate.

I am directed by the President to say that if the object of the resolution is to inquire into the reasons for the suspension of Mr. Ward, these papers are not to be considered as constituting all the evidence submitted to him in relation thereto.

I am also directed by the President to say that he does not consider it consistent with the public interests to transmit copies of unofficial papers from private citizens held in my custody for him which relate exclusively to the suspension of incumbents.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication is accompanied by a large body of papers, which are on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate. The communication, together with the papers, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

SESSION LAWS OF DAKOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of Dakota, transmitting, in compliance with law, a copy of the session laws of the last Territorial Legislature; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents to Congress for the calendar year ending December 31, 1885; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the citizens' harbor committee of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the improvement of Wilmington Harbor, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a memorial and concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, respecting the manufacture of imitations of butter and cheese. The memorialists ask that an internal-revenue tax be placed upon these imitations. I suppose such a measure must necessarily originate in the House of Representatives, but I ask that the memorial may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Chief Clerk read the memorial, as follows:

Memorial and concurrent resolution in relation to internal-revenue tax on all and any substance in semblance of butter and cheese not made exclusively from milk or cream.

Whereas the dairy interests of this State and the United States having become a potent factor in the commercial prosperity of the people; and

Whereas certain parties are engaged in the manufacture of a semblance of butter and cheese, the ingredients of which are fat and other substances not obtained from milk or cream, and the same is being sold in all the principal cities of the United States to the detriment of the dairy interests of this and all the States comprising the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to present and advocate the passage of a law providing that all such manufactured articles not made from pure milk or cream shall pay an internal-revenue tax of such amount per pound as shall protect the dairy interests of the different States, and all packages containing such manufactured articles shall be stamped as provided by the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, duly signed and attested, be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress by the secretary of state for their information.

I, Frank D. Jackson, secretary of state of the State of Iowa, hereby certify the above to be a true copy of the original resolution as passed by the house and concurred in by the senate of the Twenty-first General Assembly of Iowa, as the same appears on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State. Done at the capital at Des Moines, this 5th day of February, A. D. 1886, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth and of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

[SEAL.] FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the memorial will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I suggest, as that matter is already before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that the memorial be referred there. The fact that it asks for an internal-revenue tax, which bill, of course, can not be brought forward by this body, should not necessarily send it to the Finance Committee. The whole subject is before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry by several petitions and in other ways.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the memorial going to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for the time being. I only call the attention of the chairman of that committee to the fact that it is a very important subject and should receive attention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of citizens of Braidwood, Ill., praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers of Wapeton, Dak., and the petition of Post No. 94, Grand Army of the Republic, of Henry, Ill., praying for the passage of a bill embodying the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Caroline F. Ferguson, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Federation of Labor Unions of Washington, D. C.; resolutions adopted by the brick manufacturers of the District of Columbia, and resolutions of the Plasterers' Association of the District of Columbia, protesting against any change in the lien laws of the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of Typographical Union No. 124, Bloomington, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 191, relating to copyrights; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of George H. Boyd, late second lieutenant Eleventh Ohio Cavalry, praying to have certain disabilities removed from his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of George C. Gordon, an inmate of the National Soldiers' Home at Milwaukee, Wis., praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of ladies and men of Galva, Ill., praying that Congress will adopt a resolution submitting to the several State Legislatures a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution giving the right of suffrage to women; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MANDERSON presented the petition of Rev. W. M. Taylor and other citizens of Nebraska, residing at Stockville, in that State, praying for a constitutional amendment permitting suffrage to women; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Stanton, Nebr., praying for pension legislation as recommended by the Grand Army of the Republic national pension committee; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAXEY. I present a resolution adopted by the Board of Trade of Corsicana, Tex., favoring the improvement of Sabine Pass, and also calling the attention of Congress to the importance of the improvement of the harbor at Galveston, Tex. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of Local Assembly No. 4008, Knights of Labor, of Fort Worth, Tex., praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for scientific temperance instruction in the public schools, which is addressed to Congress and is in these words:

Believing that such instruction is essential to the welfare of the individual and the well-being of the public, we, the undersigned, citizens of the District of Columbia, respectfully petition your honorable bodies to enact a law requiring in all schools in this District instruction in physiology and hygiene, which shall give special prominence to the nature of alcoholic drinks, narcotics, and poisons, and of their effects upon the human system.

The petition is signed by 1,163 citizens of the District, who give their names, their original signatures, and their places of residence. It is a very large, influential, and representative petition. I ask that the petition lie on the table, the bill in question having been already reported favorably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be laid on the table.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of Mrs. Lettie Allen and 18 other ladies of Berlin, Wis., and a petition of Mrs. B. Birmingham and 19 other ladies of Abrams, Oconto County, Wisconsin, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the constitution prohibiting the disfranchisement of any citizen on account of sex; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of citizens of Galva, Ill., praying for the submission to the several State Legislatures of a constitutional amendment extending the right of suffrage to women; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Bloomington Typographical Union, No. 124, of Bloomington, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 191, in relation to an international copyright, and recommending the passage of the Chace bill; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of Local Assembly No. 3351, Knights of Labor, Oxford, N. Y., praying that the Oklahoma lands be opened to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Central Labor Union of Buffalo, N. Y., and a memorial of shoemakers of New York, remonstrating against any change of the pilot laws; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Veteran Assembly of Knights of Labor, No. 1833, of Utica, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 999, known as the Dingley pilot bill, and against Senate bills Nos. 265 and 1003, known as the Frye pilot bills; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a memorial numerously signed by citizens of Washington, D. C., protesting against the abolition of the school board and asking the passage of Senate bill No. 1238. This memorial is accompanied by three exhibits, marked respectively A, B, and C, and as they contain matter of importance affecting legislation pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia, I move that the memorial and the accompanying exhibits be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, in favor of the enactment of a law granting the the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railroad. As the committee have acted upon that subject, I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and lie upon the table.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it is reported that there is a bill pending in Congress to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That our Representatives in Congress are hereby requested, and our Senators instructed, to use their best efforts to secure the passage of said bill in Congress.

STATE OF KANSAS, Office of Secretary of State.

I, E. B. Allen, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal this the — day of February, A. D. 1886, at Topeka Kans.

[SEAL.] E. B. ALLEN, Secretary of State.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of Burnside Post, No. 28, Grand Army of the Republic, of Topeka, Kans., praying for an increase of pension to ex-Union soldiers who have suffered certain disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution of Knights of Labor Local Assembly No. 4089, of Burlingame, Kans., remonstrating against the passage by Congress of the bill known as the Frye pilot bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of Philip Ritz, of Washington Territory, praying for an appropriation for the purpose of sinking an artesian well in Eastern Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present the petition of H. B. Wood and 57 other leading and influential citizens of the town of Spencer, Iowa, praying for the passage of a joint resolution submitting to the States a proposition to so amend the Constitution of the United States as to protect women in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men. I move that the petition lie on the table, inasmuch as the measure has been reported on.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of the members of the Springdale (Iowa) quarterly meeting of Friends, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 355, to promote peace among nations and for the establishment of a tribunal of international arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of B. F. Coon and 23 other citizens of Iowa, praying for the passage of an act of absolute forfeiture of the unearned lands within the grant to the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad Company; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Assembly, No. 4556, Knights of Labor, of Des Moines, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 1003, known as the Frye pilot bill, and in favor of the prohibition of Chinese immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present six petitions, numerously signed by licensed pilots and engineers of steam-vessels of the United States, praying for certain legislation in regard to a refund of license tax. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Commerce, to accompany a bill now pending before that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of local assemblies, Knights of Labor, of Mooreville and Trenton, Mo., and a petition of Local Assembly, No. 3726, Knights of Labor, of Missouri, praying for the organization of a Terrritorial form of government over the Indian Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present a communication from the Springfield Farmers' Club of Connecticut, which is addressed to me individually, but is in the nature of a memorial, remonstrating against an increase in the rates of postage on fourth-class mail matter. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SABIN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Saint Paul, Minn., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Missouri River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of Local Assembly, No. 1800, Knights of Labor, of Topeka, Kans., praying for the organization of a Territorial form of government for the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB. I present petitions, numerously signed by citizens of South Haven, Wichita, and vicinity, and of Lecompton and vicinity, praying that the vacant lands of the Indian Territory may be opened to public settlement under a bill introduced by Hon. J. B. WEAVER in the House of Representatives. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I present also a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, asking for the survey and sale of the military reservation in Ford County, Kansas, known as the Fort Dodge military reservation.

I wish to say, in connection with the resolution, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, that on the 5th day of July, 1884, Congress passed a law authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to the Interior Department all useless military reservations; that in accordance with that law the Fort Dodge military reservation has been turned over to the Interior Department for sale; and that by an appropriation made on the 3d day of March last money was provided for a survey of that in common with other reservations. So that whatever fault there is about the retention of this reservation in the hands of the Interior Department is that of the administration and not of Congress.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution, asking our delegation in Congress to secure the survey and sale of the military reservation in Ford County, known as Fort Dodge.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Kansas (the senate concurring therein), That our delegation in Congress be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to secure at as early a day as possible the survey and sale as public lands of the military reservation in Ford County, Kansas, known as Fort Dodge.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state forward a copy of this resolution to each of our members in Congress and a copy to the President of the United States Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington.

STATE OF KANSAS, Office of the Secretary of State.

I, E. B. Allen, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal this 3d day of February, A. D. 1886, at Topeka, Kans.

[SEAL.] E. B. ALLEN, Secretary of State.

Mr. GEORGE presented a resolution of Sanctuary Lee Assembly, No. 3875, Knights of Labor, of McComb City, Miss., in favor of the passage

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Indiana, praying for the organization of a Territorial form of government over the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers, citizens of Indiana, praying for the passage of a bill providing for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers, praying the passage of a bill providing an equalization of bounties; which was referred to to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers, praying that ex-soldiers of the Mexican war be granted pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE. I present a petition of certain citizens of Mississippi, praying for the improvement of Cassity Bayou; and I ask that the clerks make a copy of it, so that it may be presented in the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No order is necessary; that will be done on application. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a memorial of members of the National Greenback party of the State of Iowa, which I ask may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Memorial to Congress by members of the National Greenback party of the State of Iowa, assembled in conference at the city of Des Moines on January 22, 1886, and sent to members of Congress from that State and others by their instructions.

To save the Republic, to deliver our industries from the grip of death, to do justice to suffering and pauperized classes, we ask:

LAND.

That the representatives of the people shall adopt the beneficent theory that the earth is the natural heritage of the people, and that every American citizen is entitled to so much thereof as may be needed to comfortably preserve his life and the lives of his family.

If a corporation may condemn and take occupied lands and houses for the gain of stockholders, certainly the sovereign state may condemn and take unoccupied lands to preserve the lives of citizens.

We demand that Congress protect the people from land monopolists wherever its authority extends, be they railroad companies, Indians, or private speculators, by taking for the state under equitable laws lands held from settlement in large bodies and opening them to homesteaders.

TRANSPORTATION AND DEBT.

We ask Congress to stop squandering taxes in dredging mud creeks and constructing canals which belong to a former stage-coach civilization, and are as little adapted to the necessities of present business as a last year's almanac, but we insist that our money shall be used to pay the war debt, build national double-track steel railroads, and erect a postal-telegraph system.

MONEY.

The people of the United States are burdened with mortgages and debts of various kinds estimated at $20,000,000,000. These debts draw twice to three times greater interest than labor can yield. As an inevitable consequence, farms, homes, and other properties are gradually passing into the possession of a rich class of money-lenders. The United States Government for many years has profitably loaned its credit money to bankers at 1 per cent., and the various States have profitably loaned school and other funds to individuals. Other governments, too, have often furnished popular loans with great profit to the state as well as to the borrower. England has recently authorized the largest state loans ever offered private individuals in the history of the world, to enable poor farmers to purchase their homes. We ask the Congress of the United States to come to the relief of our usury-taxed people by amending the national-bank act, extending Government loans to all such applicants as can furnish approved security to three times the amount desired, and that the volume of greenback or legal-tender paper money be regulated by the demand for these loans.

We believe under the above systems no panics, no forced sales, no poverty-stricken or millionaire class could exist, and that labor would receive its just reward. We, therefore, urge our representatives to cease quarreling over the yellow and white metals, the money of savages, and address themselves to these measures of relief and justice.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to say simply, without expressing any opinion as to the main portions of the petition, that I think that part of it which commends to Congress the propriety of spending the money that it is now spending upon minor creeks, and even the major ones, for the construction of railways, which would have a perceptible effect upon the prices paid for transportation, is entirely worthy of consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONGER presented a petition of numerous citizens of the town of Delaware and vicinity, in the State of Michigan, praying for the erection of a harbor at Forestville, on Lake Huron, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Mary A. Plant and other citizens of Port Huron, Mich., praying for legislation in the interest of suffrage for women; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Assembly, Knights of Labor, No. 3396, of Cheboygan, Mich., praying for the organization of a Territorial form of government for the Indian Territory, the opening up of all public and unoccupied lands in that Territory to homestead settlement, and the allotment of lands to the Indians in severalty; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BOWEN presented a petition of citizens of Montrose, Colo., praying for the passage of a bill embodying the recommendations of the national committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 90) to grant to the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway the right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 1484) to authorize the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the committee report adversely on Senate bill 90?

Mr. DAWES. The committee do not report upon the original bill; they report a new bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That still remains in committee.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 804) to grant to the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported a bill (S. 1485) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1305) to grant to the Denison and Washita Valley Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported a bill (S. 1486) to authorize the Denison and Washita Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 12) to authorize the juries of the United States circuit and district courts to be used interchangeably and to provide for drawing talesmen, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, found to be mineral lands, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 994) granting to the State of California 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of lands in said State, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 188) to prevent the acquisition of real property by aliens, and for other purposes, to report it with a recommendation that it pass as proposed to be amended. I shall ask consent at some future time to submit a written report to accompany the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back adversely, with an amendment, the bill (S. 371) limiting a portion of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes." It is proper I should state that my friend the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has a written report representing one-half of the committee. I have submitted with the bill an amendment accompanied by a written report representing the other half of the committee. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg to state that the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who I see is not in his seat, has a report on the same subject, representing the other half of the committee. It is rather an anomalous condition of things.

Mr. HALE subsequently said: I wish to know what the record is with reference to a report made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] this morning on the bill (S. 371) limiting a portion of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes." I was not present at the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An adverse report was made, and it was stated that the Senator from Maine would submit a report from an equal number of the committee to accompany the bill.

Mr. HALE. I present the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina was understood by the Chair and by the officers at the desk as reporting that bill adversely, but with an amendment.

Mr. HALE. That is correct; and I now submit a report sustaining the adverse report. The Senator from South Carolina presents another report from the other half of the committee, but I wish to present a report sustaining the adverse report with accompanying papers, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received, and printed with the other report.

Mr. BUTLER. That was the statement I made at the time, that the report which I presented represented the views of one-half the committee, and the report the Senator from Maine would make would represent the other half. I reported the bill adversely, and asked that it be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. That is correct, of course.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the situation.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has done it just right, as he always does. I only wish that this report shall go in as sustaining the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reports will be printed together.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1154) to authorize the city of Newport, R. I., to use the site of Fort Greene as a public park, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 394) to establish an additional land office in the State of Nebraska and the bill (S. 716) to establish an additional land office in the State of Nebraska, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. 1487) to establish two additional land districts in the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE TO MRS. GRANT.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 579) granting a franking privilege to Julia D. Grant, to report it favorably, without amendment. I ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that all mail-matter carried by post to Julia D. Grant, widow of the late Ulysses S. Grant, or sent by her under her written autograph signature, shall be conveyed free of postage during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5198) to remove the disabilities of John Taylor Wood, of Louisiana;

He also introduced a bill (S. 1493) for the relief of Col. Jesse H. Strickland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1494) granting a pension to Stephen D. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1495) to limit ownership of lands now belonging to the public domain; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1496) making an appropriation for the establishment of a life-saving station and providing for a life-saving crew at Fort Stevens, at the entrance to the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GEORGE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1497) to regulate the wages of the employés in the Government Printing Office; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1498) granting a pension to John G. Burrill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (by request), introduced a bill (S. 1499) for the relief of Isaac H. Marks and Samuel Stone; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1500) for the relief of E. G. Corder, sr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1501) for the relief of Gibson Morrison; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KENNA (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1502) for the relief of Andrew J. Spradling; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 1503) for the relief of the estate of Rev. Ignatius T. Cooper, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1504) to amend the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1883; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER introduced a bill (S. 1505) to amend and extend the provisions of a certain act of Congress, approved 20th June, 1878, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, and to provide for the payment of workmen under the late board of public works in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES. I have received from the judge of the district court at Fort Smith, Ark., a bill conferring jurisdiction on the United States courts over the Indian country in certain criminal cases. It is a bill that has been prepared by him with great care. I do not know the merits of the bill. I introduce it at his request, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 1506) conferring jurisdiction on the United States courts over the Indian country in certain criminal cases was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1507) to reclaim to the United States certain lands improperly and illegally listed to the State of Michigan for the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Ship Canal Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1508) granting a pension to James A. Boyden; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1509) granting a pension to William H. Moore; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 1510) for the relief of the heirs of Henry A. Shadel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 1511) to protect innocent purchasers of patented articles, and for other purposes; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. GEORGE. The bill is short, but on a very important subject, and I desire to have it read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be a valid defense to any action for an infringement of any patent, or any suit or proceeding to enjoin any person from the use of a patented article, that the defendant therein, or his assignor, purchased the patented article for use or consumption, and not for sale or exchange, in good faith and in the usual course of trade, without notice that the same was covered by a patent, or without notice that the seller had no right to sell such article; and in all such cases notice received after such purchase shall not have the effect to impair in any way the right of such purchaser as absolute owner.

SEC. 2. That all patents for any discovery or invention hereafter granted by the United States shall be subject to purchase by Congress for the use of the people of the United States at such reasonable valuation and on such terms and in such mode as may be provided for by law, and all such patents shall be considered and treated in law as issued subject to that condition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not desire to have it referred. I want to have it lie on the table, so that I may call it up and submit some remarks upon it.

Mr. HOAR. What is the title of the bill?

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill to protect innocent purchasers of patented articles, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. It should read: "A bill to overthrow the patent laws."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 1512) for the relief of Audley C. Britton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1513) for the relief of George T. Newman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1514) to correct the record of Assistant Surgeon Azpell; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not agree to the proposition suggested in the bill. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1515) to authorize the President of the United States to send delegates to an international American congress for the arbitration of all national differences; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1516) to authorize the construction of a pile and ponton railway and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River from the city of Winona, State of Minnesota, to the opposite shore of said river, in the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 1517) for the relief of Elizabeth E. Sinclair; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1519) to continue the streets and avenues of the city of Washington in conformity with the present existing plans of the city in and upon all subdivisions of land hereafter made in the District of Columbia without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1520) granting a pension to Henry Domeger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1521) granting an increase of pension to Joseph S. C. Rowland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1522) for the relief of James B. McCubbin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1523) for the relief of Michael Mayers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1524) to readjudicate the pension claim of Francis A. Liebschuts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1525) to require the testing of chains and anchors, and for the better securing of life and property on shipboard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1526) amending sections 4756 and 4757 of the Revised Statutes, relating to pensions to certain disabled persons who have served in the Navy or Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1527) to provide a temporary home for certain persons discharged from the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1528) amending section 2166 of the Revised Statutes relative to aliens honorably discharged from the military service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1529) for the relief of Holman Anderson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PAYNE introduced a bill (S. 1530) for the erection of a public building at Steubenville, Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LOGAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1531) to increase the pension of William Winans; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 40) providing for the payment of per diem laborers in Government employ on the 30th of May of each year as on other days; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. TELLER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 41) providing for the printing of ethnological reports on the North American Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 42) providing for the distribution of reports of United States Geological Survey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Joint Committee on Printing.

TAXATION OF RAILROAD GRANT LANDS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I introduce a bill, and beg leave to make a few remarks very briefly concerning the purpose of the measure.

The bill (S. 1518) relating to the taxation of railroad grant lands and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. HAWLEY. I should like to occupy the time of the Senate for two or three minutes in stating the grievance at which this bill aims—a very sore grievance and one that demands a speedy remedy.

An exceedingly large quantity of land, perhaps 50,000 square miles, was granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad. An amendatory act provided that before patents should issue for the land to that company it should pay all fees relating to or due for selection and survey. Those fees amount to perhaps 3 cents an acre. Now, the road has paid all its fees upon only about 80,000 acres of this enormous grant, but, if I am not misinformed, it has not taken out patents even for those. It has proceeded, nevertheless, to give warranty deeds for many millions upon millions of acres to the settlers along the line. At the same time it has ingeniously proceeded, properly enough, to locate the villages and cities along the line upon its own selected sections. These lands that they conveyed by warranty deed have been settled, in many cases improved, and in many cases there are thriving villages upon them.

It turns out now by a decision of the Supreme Court rendered at the October term, delivered some time in December, that none of those millions of acres of land are taxable. I think the reasons given by the Supreme Court are irrefutable. The power that orders lands sold for taxes is supposed to be sovereign and a sale for taxes should convey a perfect title. But to do so in these is to destroy the lien held by the sovereign power that granted these lands, but has not been paid its fees and has not issued patents for them.

In short, the Supreme Court shows clearly that these lands are nontaxable. This then is the condition: Those who have paid voluntarily their taxes can not recover them; those who have paid them under protest and those whose lands have been taken from them by tax sales have a remedy against the municipality or the Territory and can recover those taxes. They are but a minority, however, of the people. They consist to some extent of foreign holders, who purchased in large quantities, and who, it is alleged and believed in the Territory of Dakota, had a suggestion from the company in advance that those lands would not be taxable. However that may be, the minority of people entered their protest and can recover, while the majority are apparently without a remedy.

Now the counties find themselves, some of them, in this condition: They are liable to large claims for taxes that have been paid, but about nine-tenths of their tax-list has been destroyed by the decision; they are almost in a bankrupt condition.

I speak of this matter, an Eastern man, because Eastern men, neighbors and friends of mine have settled there, suffer under this treatment, and come to their friends in the East for aid, having no voting representatives of their own. They have exhausted conversation with the president of that railroad company and with the Commissioner of the General Land Office. One declines to act for one reason, another for another. Between them both the railroad neglects to pay the small sum of 3 cents an acre on this land which it has warranted, the citizens have been unlawfully taxed but can not reclaim the money, and the counties and municipalities find themselves liable to heavy reclamations, and see their list of taxable improved property largely reduced.

This subject is already before the Committee on Public Lands. I commend it to them as presenting a case for immediate action and for a severe and instant remedy. The Supreme Court says truly that it can do nothing but declare the law, but that the remedy is with Congress, and it intimates the nature of that remedy.

The bill is drawn by intelligent lawyers of the Territory of Dakota. It attempts to validate the collection of the taxes referred to. The power to do that, equitable as the act might be, I neither affirm nor deny, but some at least of the provisions of the bill are certainly both practicable and equitable. Justice to the future settler is certainly within the reach of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VAN WYCK. One word, if the Senator from Connecticut will consent.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I wish to supplement the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Connecticut by saying that in fact only one-half of the enormity and outrage to which he refers has been stated by him in the remarks which he has made.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose so.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is so with all the railroads in the West claiming the benefit of that which was supposed to be a hardship upon the railroad companies, imposed by their own shrewdness, a clause that they should be required, as the Senator states, to pay 2 or 3 cents per acre, the cost of surveying; and after that those companies have sought exemption from taxation for these many years, and not only that, but have really made that the cause of increasing their own revenues, because not yet having taken patents, exercising rights of absolute ownership, when they make a sale of this land to the citizen that is one of the inducements for a larger price that these very railroad companies obtain from him on the condition that they will not apply for or receive a patent for a certain number of years, which will exempt the land from taxation in their hands. Therefore, a double wrong is perpetrated, first to exempt themselves from taxation and then to extort a larger price for their land by reason of this favorable condition which they can give to it.

This very same railroad, as other railroads in the West to which the Senator refers, because they had included a section that the right of way should not be taxed, escaped taxation for all their depots, for all their improvements, their round-houses, and all their property, and they bid defiance in the 1,500 miles through which they pass to all the Territories through which they go, and do not pay a dollar of taxation.

I thank the Senator from Connecticut for having introduced the bill at this time. The Committee on Public Lands have been giving considerable time during this session to mature a bill which shall reach all the railroads to which donations of land have been given, and they hope to make a favorable report upon a kindred bill at the next session of the committee.

Mr. TELLER. One would suppose from the statement of the case, as this matter is discussed, that this was a new question. It has been before Congress now for several years, certainly for four years as reported from the Department of the Interior with a recommendation that some legislation should be had upon the subject. It is beyond the power of the executive department of the Government. There is nothing that the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office can do with reference to this matter. All the evils complained of exist and have existed for years, and Secretary after Secretary has reported to this body the evils, the full evils, and requested legislation to enable the Department to protect the settler who goes into the new country and does not buy of the railroad company, but takes Government land, who pays taxes while his neighbor buying from the railroad company pays no taxes at all. If there is any fault anywhere, it lies with the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado, who I know has very great familiarity with this subject-matter, whether this is not the prime difficulty: As I understand the decision of the Supreme Court, the lands are not taxable because the railroad corporations have not paid the small pittance required per acre as the cost of the survey of the lands; therefore it follows that the Government has a certain interest in the land, and consequently it is not taxable for State, Territorial, and municipal purposes. Now, if there should be a change in the law, repealing the provisions that required the railroad companies to pay this paltry sum for the survey of the land, would not these lands then be taxable as a matter of course; and is not that the character of legislation which is required of Congress?

Mr. TELLER. On the 2d of July, 1864, an act of Congress was passed, which is to be found in 13 Statutes at Large, page 365, the twenty-first section of which is as follows:

> And be it further enacted, That before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any company or party entitled thereto under this act, there shall first be paid into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same by the said company or party in interest as the titles shall be required by said company, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account, to be used by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of said roads, and so from year to year, until the whole shall be completed, as provided under the provisions of this act.

This was inserted in the amendatory act concerning the Pacific railroads in 1864, and was for the purpose, or supposed to be, I presume, by the legislative department, of compelling the company to bear the burdens of the surveys. In some instances the companies have paid for their surveys, but in very few cases have they paid. In the last report which I had the honor of submitting I presented a full and detailed statement of the amount that was still due and ought to be paid. In the three reports that I submitted to Congress I presented this question every time, as my predecessors had been doing from three to five years, as I recollect.

The decision now spoken of was delivered recently, but the original decision was delivered by the Supreme Court five or six years ago. Some of the Senators may be more familiar with the date and can say. The subject has been here again and again. Of course, if this provision of the law was repealed it would be very much better than to allow the railroad companies to continue to hold these lands free from taxation; but perhaps there is another remedy. As was suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], a bill before the Committee on Public Lands is now receiving the attention of that committee, and I have no doubt it will be reported.

Mr. HOAR. How rapidly can the companies do what they are bound to do on their part?

Mr. TELLER. Most of these surveys are already made. There are millions of acres that these companies are having the benefit of that have been surveyed for years. I know in some sections the land has been surveyed ten years, and much of it is occupied by the people. The men occupying the railroad lands pay no tax upon their lands, while the man on the adjoining section pays tax on his lands. It is a crying evil in the Western country, and it can not be said by the legislative department that they have not had full knowledge of the evil, and that a remedy has not been proposed by the executive department.

Mr. PLUMB. I am very much pleased to see the interest taken in this subject, which I have labored in for many years. On two separate occasions the Senate has passed a bill reported by me from the Committee on Public Lands to do exactly what the Senator from Colorado has so eloquently and graphically said ought to be done, to wit, tax the land of the Pacific railroad companies and all their branches, but for some reason or other it did not succeed in getting through the other House of Congress.

The decision which the Senator from Connecticut spoke of in regard to the Northern Pacific lands has been recently announced; but until that time, as far as I am aware, no suspicion arose that those lands were not subject to taxation.

The general question, as has been said by the Senator from Nebraska, is under consideration by the Committee on Public Lands now; and reenforced as this subject seems to be now by a large number of Senators who are awake to the robbery that has been going on for a number of years, I hope a proper measure will pass Congress when it comes before it, and will not have to go begging for supporters as heretofore.

Mr. DOLPH. In addition to what has been said, I think that perhaps a word of explanation with regard to the decision which has been made by the Supreme Court upon the subject of the taxation of railroad lands would not be inappropriate.

The decision made several years ago by the Supreme Court, and which has been referred to by the Senator from Colorado, was a decision made in relation to the lands which were granted to the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies. The proviso, as I recollect now, in regard to the payment by those companies of the cost of survey was included in the original act of incorporation; and therefore there was no question made as to the liability of the companies to pay the cost of survey. It was held by the Supreme Court that until the cost of survey was paid the Government of the United States had such an interest in the lands that they could not be taxed and sold for taxation by the States or Territories. But in the case of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, although the act was passed, I think, on the same day as the act making the grant which was under consideration by the Supreme Court some years ago, the granting act did not contain this provision, and the clause requiring the payment of the cost of survey was contained in a subsequent act amending the original charter of the company. It was contended by the company that it was unconstitutional; that it changed the terms of the original grant; that it interfered with the vested rights of the company; but as I understand it the company did acquiesce and pay under protest various sums claimed by the Interior Department. It is only recently that the Supreme Court has decided that the amendatory act was constitutional. It had been previously decided by a court in Dakota Territory, and I think probably in one of the States, perhaps Minnesota, that the amendatory act requiring payment of the cost of survey was unconstitutional and void, but the Supreme Court has held that Congress had power to make that provision. That decision has only been made within a few weeks past.

I only rose to make this statement in regard to the adjudications which have been made, and to give the reason why the last decision of the Supreme Court was upon a different point than had been decided by the court several years ago.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The statement made by the Senator from Colorado is correct; the fault in this matter does lie with Congress. Their attention has been called to the subject year after year by reports from the Department over which he presided and by his predecessors before him, and it has been substantially called to the attention of Congress by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], has stated that in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses he, as well as myself, introduced bills for the purpose of correcting this very matter. In the Forty-eighth Congress it was referred to the Judiciary Committee. The bill came out of that committee not entirely as was desired, but possibly it was hoped it would be amended in the Senate. We succeeded in having that bill placed upon the Special Calendar, and there it remained on the Special Calendar and was the next bill to be reached at the adjournment of the Forty-eighth Congress.

That is the history of the matter as far as Congress is concerned, and I rejoice that the Senator from Connecticut has called the attention of the Senate to the matter, and that we have had this discussion upon it, because it will facilitate the disposition of the question.

These railroad companies first came and asked Congress to put this little condition within the granting bills, knowing the effect that it would have to protect their lands from taxation; and then, to embarrass matters still more, these very railroad companies came into court and asked to have it declared unconstitutional. That is certainly strange.

My colleague from Nebraska suggests that we should repeal the clause imposing this two or three cents an acre, the cost of survey, upon these companies. They have enjoyed the benefit of that for ten years and more, and Congress can require the payment of that cost, and can also require them to pay the taxes annually. I suggest that it will not be necessary now to relieve them from even the payment of that small sum. The Supreme Court certainly decided at one term that these companies had sufficient title in the lands to execute a mortgage on them. If they had title sufficient to mortgage, and there was a default in the payment, then the mortgagee could sell the lands and deprive the Government of its inchoate right to the lands. The very same court in the next few years, with the same members, decided that these railroads have not title sufficient to be taxed, because if the lands could be taxed they could be sold for non-payment of taxes and thereby deprive the Government of its two or three cents upon the acre, the cost of survey, while it had held that their title was sufficiently good to mortgage, and if that mortgage was foreclosed the Government would be equally deprived of its inchoate right to this property.

That is the attitude of this question. Nothing more need be said. It has been correctly stated, and I congratulate the Northwest, the country through which these railroads run, which have been exempt from taxation for their immense domain, that attention has thus early been called to it. It bespeaks when the matter shall be presented from the Committee on Public Lands an active as well as a successful consideration and disposition of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENTS TO A BILL.

Mr. VAN WYCK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer an amendment to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors. The amendment I propose is to increase the pensions of minor children. I move that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That John W. Cheek have leave to withdraw his petition and papers in respect to his claim from the files, no adverse report having been made therein.

On motion of Mr. MAXEY, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William Schuchardt be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Gideon Walker be withdrawn from the files for the purpose of reference to the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers relating to the case of Mrs. Margaret Smith be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of John R. Harrington be withdrawn from the files for the purpose of their being referred to the Committee on Patents of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Joseph R. Shannon be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of New York, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the legal representatives of Joseph Torrey, the memorial of the legal representatives of William Johonnot, and the memorial of the legal representatives of Thomas Blackwell, together with the documents from the Treasury with them respectively connected, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

COPIES OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish the Library of the Senate with 40 copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HUDSON, N. Y.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. An error was made in a bill which passed the Senate last week, being the bill (S. 637) for the erection of a public building at Hudson, N. Y. I desire to move that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate for reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I enter at the same time a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

EDUCATION IN ALASKA.

Mr. BLAIR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish to the Senate the report of Sheldon Jackson on education in Alaska.

SPECIAL LAND AGENTS.

Mr. PLUMB. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate as to the names and number of special agents employed by his Department for the purpose of the detection of frauds in the entries of public lands; length of time employed, respectively; compensation and expenses paid to each; the number of cases sent to said special agents for investigation and report; the number of cases reported upon by each of said agents; and during what period of time; the number of cases of entries of public lands which have been suspended and which under the rules of the Department will require to be specially investigated before being finally decided.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that reported from a committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is submitted by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest an amendment in regard to the number——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not if the amendment is agreed to. The amendment is "also the number found in the employment of the Department at the time he took charge of it."

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to that; but what I am desirous of ascertaining is how long it will take with the present machinery of the Department to get rid of all the cases which are now under investigation, in order that we may know something of what to expect in regard to the disposition of public land entries during the next fiscal year

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it not be better, then, to go back and see how long these men have been in the service investigating these matters?

Mr. PLUMB. If you refer to those now in his employ, if you want to know how long they have been there, I have no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. And how long the same number of persons have been employed.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to that. The resolution is not for the purpose of imputing to any one in the Department a neglect of duty, but for the purpose of showing the relation of this special service to the work it has to do.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then we ought to know how long an equal number of persons or any number have been engaged in this kind of work. I understand the object of the Senator. He is perfectly right in it. We ought to know when this thing is going to be wound up. I understand a certain number have been employed. I have examined the register of the Interior Department in 1884 and the register issued a few days ago, and they correspond, my recollection is, almost exactly as to the number. I have not gone back to trace up how long there has been that number employed in this special service. I found that there were three special inspectors of surveyors-general and district land offices; twenty-six or twenty-seven inspectors of timber depredations, and then thirty-six or thirty-seven of another class.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection, but I should like to get at the whole subject, to know how long we are to keep up this branch of the service; and I suggest that the resolution require a report of the length of time this force or anything equal to it has been in the employment of the Government.

Mr. PLUMB. I think in order to enable the Senator to prepare his amendment the resolution had better be printed and go over. We shall then be able to make it correspond with his idea.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

PROHIBITION OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. On Thursday last I introduced Senate bill 1483, which, at my request, was laid on the table. One object of the bill is to abrogate all treaty provisions existing between the United States and the Chinese Government in so far as they permit the coming of Chinese to the United States and in so far as they inhibit the Congress of the United States from absolutely prohibiting the coming of Chinese to the United States. I shall on Tuesday of next week, the 23d instant, request the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that bill solely for the purpose of enabling me to submit some remarks in support of the bill, at which time I shall endeavor to show to the satisfaction of all that it is not only within the power of the Congress of the United States to abrogate a treaty, but that that doctrine has been recognized by every department of the Government for nearly ninety years past, commencing with an act of Congress passed over eighty-seven years ago abrogating our treaty with France.

I shall further attempt to show at that time that it has become a duty of the United States Government to get rid of what is commonly known as the Burlingame treaty and all other treaties existing between the United States Government and the Government of China which in any manner permit the coming of Chinese to the United States, and if it can not be done by negotiations between the two governments—and it has not been done—that it now becomes a bounden duty, the provisions of these several treaties having become pernicious to the peace and tranquillity and general welfare of this country, to abrogate them by act of Congress.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 34) to authorize the East and West Railroad Company of Alabama to maintain a bridge across the Coosa River; and

A bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River.

The bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names or locations was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 5198) to remove the disabilities of John Taylor Wood, of Louisiana, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance if there be no objection.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to have that bill acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent of the Senate to put upon its passage a House bill without reference.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

Mr. BECK. I will state what it is.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the bill be read.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to object to the consideration of the bill to interfere with unfinished business—no further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read. It is subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Has that been to any committee of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say one word. If there is a single objection I have not a word to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks leave to be heard. No objection being made, he will proceed.

Mr. BECK. The bill came from the House and is an exact copy of section 3613 of the Revised Statutes, which gives to any assistant treasurer or designated depositary the right to make the appointment precisely as this gives the right to the Treasurer. The Treasurer now has no such power by section 304 except to authorize the assistant treasurer to act. The assistant treasurer to-day is sick, and the Treasurer himself, I am advised this morning, is hardly able to be at his office. The only provision of this bill is that he shall have the same power given to him when he himself is unable to be in his office that section 3613 gives to all the designated depositaries and assistant treasurers. That is all there is in the bill, and I thought perhaps there would be no objection to its immediate consideration and passage.

Mr. ALLISON. I think this bill had better lie over.

Mr. BECK. Then let it go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON. There will be no harm in letting it go over one day, because to-morrow the Finance Committee meet. If it should turn out that it is a matter of pressing importance it can be reported at once. It is a very bad precedent, as the Senator knows, to pass bills without examination.

Mr. BECK. I know it is.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to point out that this bill does not disclose by its title what it means. It is merely a bill to amend a certain section of the Revised Statutes. A bill with such a title passes without any knowledge by the public of what is going on. No bill ever ought to pass without having the title distinctly disclose its object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication, under date of the 9th instant, from the Secretary of the Interior, and the accompanying last annual report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railway Company.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 15, 1886.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that is the report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad for the last year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest that that report should be printed in connection with the other reports of the Union Pacific Railroad Directors ordered by the Senate a few days ago to be printed. If the Chair will allow it to lie on the table until the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] can examine it, I shall call his attention to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the message will lie on the table for the present.

SAC AND FOX AND IOWA RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 12th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, the draught of a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to amend the third section of the act of March 3, 1885, "to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservation in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes."

The matter is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 15, 1886.

JUDICIAL BUSINESS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. MAHONE. I offer the following resolution and ask its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to inform the Senate of the number of cases in which the United States were a party or interested pending in the circuit and district courts of the eastern district of Virginia at the terms of such courts held in the year 1884, and also in the year 1885, and that he also inform the Senate whether any, and if so what, assistant district attorneys have been appointed for that district during those years or since, and at what rate of compensation; and that he transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers in the possession of the Department of Justice relating to any such appointment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that lie over and be printed. We can look at it to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the resolution will lie over and be printed.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate the number of acres of public land granted in the State of Nebraska to the land-grant railroads within that State, the number of acres upon which cost of survey has been paid, and the amount paid in Nebraska, and also the number of acres in the remainder of said grant, the probable cost of such survey, and the number of acres patented in said State by each of said railroads.

REPRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. DOLPH. On the 1st of February I reported from the Committee on Public Lands Senate bill 1296, with a written report, No. 69. I am informed that the report has been exhausted, that there is but a single copy left. It is in considerable demand by Senators, many correspondents making inquiries in regard to what is proposed. I move that the report be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves to reprint for the use of the Senate Report No. 69, on the bill (S. 1296) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber-culture, and for other purposes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order to reprint is made.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that he had this day approved the following acts:

An act (S. 377) granting a pension to Matthias Leckner;

An act (S. 126) to change the name of the National Bank of Winona; and

An act (S. 382) to authorize the Merchants' National Bank, of Little Rock, Ark., to change its name to the First National Bank of Little Rock.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 105) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Reuben Ellwood, late a Representative in Congress; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 989) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

MISSION INDIANS OF CALIFORNIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is now closed.

Mr. DAWES. I have received this morning a letter from the Secretary of the Interior stating the great necessity of immediate action upon a bill on the Calendar. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will allow it to be brought up and considered. If it causes debate I shall not press it this morning.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to its being considered up to 2 o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the letter be read as a justification for asking for the consideration of the bill. The order of business is 104, Senate bill 53.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, February 13, 1886.

SIR: This Department has just received reliable information regarding the condition of the Mission Indians of California, with special reference to their land matters. Among other things it is reported that white men are making every effort to wrest all the agricultural lands from them; are constructing irrigating ditches which will deprive them of water, and that the Indians are greatly discouraged because of the disputes over and the uncertainty of their title to the lands which they occupy.

On December 21, 1885, the President laid before Congress detailed information as to the condition of these Indians, with a draught of a bill for their relief. (See Senate Executive Document No. 15, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.)

The bill (S. 53), I learn, has already been reported upon by your committee, and is now pending before the Senate for action.

It is very important and necessary that something should speedily be done to relieve these Indians from the embarrassments and hinderances which now surround them, and as the plan considered best and most feasible to accomplish this has been suggested in the bill presented as above stated, the Department would be greatly relieved if it could receive early consideration and action by Congress, in order that the work necessary to be done may be entered upon at the earliest practicable date.

Very respectfully,

L. Q. C. LAMAR, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN Committee on Indian Affairs,
United States Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I will say that this same bill or substantially this bill passed the Senate at its last session. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will allow it to be brought up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 53.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose that will not interfere with the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock has not yet arrived. The question is on the motion to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 53) for the relief of the Mission Indians in the State of California was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but before concluding was interrupted by,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. On that bill the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Alabama has kindly consented that it may be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the unfinished business be informally laid aside without being displaced, with a view to continue the consideration of the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall have the right to object if it leads to debate, but the Senator from Massachusetts thinks there will be no debate, so I shall not interpose an objection now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 53) for the relief of the Mission Indians in the State of California continues before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 4 of section 1, after the word "appoint," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to make the section read:

That immediately after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint three disinterested persons as commissioners to arrange a just and satisfactory settlement of the Mission Indians residing in the State of California upon reservations which shall be secured to them as hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 5, after the word "family," to insert "not more than 640 acres nor less than;" after the word "acres," in line 7, to strike out "of which 10 acres shall be arable land" and insert "at the discretion of said Secretary, of which such proportion, not exceeding 10 acres, as he shall deem for the best interest of the allottee, shall be arable land;" in line 11, after the word "age," to insert "not less than;" and in the same line, after the word "acres," to insert "apportioned in like manner;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That whenever any of the Indians residing upon any reservation patented under the provisions of this act shall desire allotments of land in severalty, the Secretary of the Interior may cause allotments to be made to such Indians in quantity as follows: To each of a family, not more than 640 nor less than 160 acres, at the discretion of said Secretary, of which such proportion, not exceeding 10 acres, as he shall deem for the best interest of the allottee, shall be arable land; to each single person over twenty-one years of age, not less than 80 acres, apportioned in like manner.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 6, to add: "Or to bring any suit, in the name of the United States, in the circuit court of the United States for California that may be found necessary to the full protection of the legal or equitable rights of any Indian or tribe of Indians in any of such lands;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That in cases where the lands occupied by any band or village of Indians are wholly or in part within the limits of any confirmed private grant or grants, it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States, upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, through special counsel or otherwise, to defend such Indians in the rights secured to them in the original grants from the Mexican Government and in an act for the government and protection of Indians passed by the Legislature of the State of California April 22, 1850, or to bring any suit, in the name of the United States, in the circuit court of the United States for California, that may be found necessary to the full protection of the legal or equitable rights of any Indian or tribe of Indians in any of such lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in opening my remarks this morning on the subject of this bill to promote the general welfare by educating the illiterates in the States, I wish to read an extract from the speech delivered by Mr. Bayard in the Senate when this bill was under consideration before, and I do it more for the purpose of endeavoring to impress upon the Senate the great importance of this measure than of presenting the views of that eminent gentleman before the Senate; for if I were to do that, in justice to him I should have read at the desk the entire argument, which is certainly a very able one:

I say, Mr. President, that the concession of this power to Congress must end in the withering of the States and in the destruction of their necessary reserved powers. The power of taxation is the most far-reaching and comprehensive power confided to government, which can be exercised in such way and under such conditions and to such extent as Congress shall see fit in its discretion. From the necessities of the subject it rests solely and is restrained only by the discretion of the department to which it is delegated. The measure of the tax burden Congress alone can control; the subjects of the burden are restricted by the Constitution expressly as in the case of export duties and impliedly as to the instrumentalities of the States, but if it be conceded that the power to lay taxes can include subjects not within the jurisdiction of Congress but expressly and admittedly and necessarily under State control, then I say you have embarked upon a principle never before heard of or claimed, and which is dangerous in the extreme. I know this bill will be held as a precedent, in my judgment a most dangerous one, which will go far to destroy all demarkation between the powers and the duties of the General Government and the powers and duties of the State governments. This to me is alarming, and because I can not pass it by in silence I have said thus much

Perhaps the Senate will not be offended, after having listened to that declaration of Mr. Bayard, at my being compelled to go further in this discussion than I went on last Thursday, when my remarks were not completed. I regret it, because the Senate is not disposed to listen even to so grave a question as this. I see that the minds of most Senators are absolutely made up on the subject, and that what I shall say will not have the slightest impression in changing their views of this very grave and serious question. But still the people exist, and the people are thoughtful, and we have been taught through many years of long and trying experience to understand that after all the true wisdom of legislation and government in this country rests in "the sober second thought" of the people. I appeal to them that they will hear and consider the arguments which are being submitted upon this bill, and after having heard and considered them they will take such measures as they think best adapted for the preservation of their own liberties.

Having promised the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] that I would endeavor to point out the distinction between the execution of the trust under which Congress holds the public lands for the benefit of the States and the power of Congress to create new trusts on behalf of the States or the people and to tax the country to raise money at its discretion, I must keep my promise.

The original thirteen States owned all the lands within their present borders, and six of them, namely, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, owned large areas of land lying between the Spanish possessions on the south, the Canadian line on the north, and the Mississippi River on the west. The seven States that had no such territorial appanages made great complaint of the overbalancing power that would result to the other six States from this excess of outlying domain. So serious was the trouble, that Maryland refused, for two years, to unite with the Confederacy, and did not come in until an understanding was reached that these "waste and unappropriated lands," as they were styled, should be ceded to the United States for the common benefit of all the States.

I am stating this history briefly and succinctly to avoid wearying the Senate with a recital of facts familiar to all. New York made the first cession of lands, on March 1, 1781, "to and for the only use and benefit of such of the States as are or shall become parties to the Articles of Confederation." This deed was not to the Government of the United States, but it was "to the States." On the 4th of March, 1774, Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Hardy, Arthur Lee, and James Monroe, on behalf of the State of Virginia, made a deed of cession of all the vast domain in the northwest "unto the United States, in Congress assembled, for the benefit of the said States, Virginia included." Why to the Congress assembled? Because Congress was the real trustee, not the Government of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask a question as to boundaries? No lands were granted west of the Mississippi, I think.

Mr. MORGAN. None at all. They came in under the Louisiana purchase. Virginia reserved out of the grant large areas of land in Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana, for the benefit of her soldiers and other donees; on the 19th April, 1785, Massachusetts ceded her lands lying west of Pennsylvania "to the United States of America, for their benefit, Massachusetts inclusive."

On the 13th December, 1786, Connecticut ceded her lands west of Pennsylvania, except a tract called "The Western Reserve," "to the United States of America, in Congress assembled, for the common use and benefit of said States, Connecticut inclusive." This cession is still more specific in the description of Congress as the trustee for the benefit of the States, Connecticut included. Connecticut, on the 20th May, 1800, ceded the political jurisdiction over the "Western Reserve," now in Ohio, "to the United States," but reserved to the State and those claiming from or under it the title "to the soil of said tract of land." I will read the language of that reservation:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, at their session begun and holden in the city of Philadelphia, on the first Monday of December, in the year 1799, made and passed an act in the words following, to wit—

therefore, in consideration of the terms and in compliance with the provisions and conditions of the said act,

Be it enacted by the governor and council and house of representatives in General Court assembled, That the State of Connecticut doth hereby renounce forever, for the use and benefit of the United States, and of the several individual States, who may be therein concerned respectively, and of all those deriving claims or titles from them, or any of them, all territorial and jurisdictional claims whatever, under any grant, charter or charters whatever, to the soil and jurisdiction of any and all lands whatever lying westward, northwestward, and southwestward, of those counties in the State of Connecticut, which are bounded westwardly by the eastern line of the State of New York, as ascertained by agreement between Connecticut and New York, in the year 1733; excepting only from this renunciation, the claim of the said State of Connecticut, and of those claiming from or under the said State of Connecticut, to the soil of said tract of land, in said act of Congress described under the name of the Western Reserve of Connecticut.

Connecticut afterward sold this land, and the "fire lands," amounting to 4,300,000 acres, and founded her school system on this as a permanent fund.

On the 9th of August, 1787, South Carolina ceded her wild lands "to the United States of America, for their benefit, South Carolina inclusive," the words "their benefit" clearly meaning the separate States. A portion of this cession stretches across North Alabama.

On the 25th of February, 1790, North Carolina, after making certain reservations, ceded her western possessions, now the State of Tennessee, and then having large white settlements, "unto the United States of America for the benefit of said States, North Carolina inclusive," "said States" meaning each and all the States. In the deed was this condition among others:

Thirdly. That all the lands intended to be ceded by virtue of this act to the United States of America, and not appropriated as before mentioned, shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of the United States of America, North Carolina inclusive, according to their respective and usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever.

On the 24th of April, 1802, Georgia ceded the land included in Mississippi and Alabama, for a cash payment out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands of $1,250,000, to the United States upon certain conditions, of which the second are as follows:

Secondly. That all persons who, on the 27th day of October, 1795, were actual settlers within the territory thus ceded, shall be confirmed in all grants legally and fully executed prior to that day by the former British government of West Florida, or by the government of Spain, and in the claims which may be derived from any actual survey or settlement made under the act of the State of Georgia, entitled "An act for laying out a district of land situate on the river Mississippi, and within the bounds of this State, into a county, to be called 'Bourbon,'" passed the 7th day of February, 1785.

Thirdly. That all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of $1,250,000 to the State of Georgia, and the grants recognized by the preceding conditions, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever.

There is certainly enough in each of these cessions to show that the original States, having outlying lands, gave up a beneficial interest in them to the States that had no such lands. They declared the beneficial interest to be reserved in themselves, and they all placed the United States in the attitude of their trustee, and as trustee of the new States to be formed from the ceded territory, to hold the proceeds in trust for all the States then existing or afterward to be formed as a common fund.

As each new State has come in the United States has treated each as a sovereign, whose recognition as such conveyed the necessary recognition of its dominion over the lands within its borders. In the case of Texas this right of dominion was recognized as being absolute to all her lands, and she ceded the right of navigation of her waters to the United States.

Alabama was, in like manner, recognized as a sovereign, and while her dominion over the land in her borders was not rightfully absolute (Georgia having sold that territory for a price), the right of Alabama as a sovereign over the land within her borders was recognized as being so far supreme that she ceded the navigation of her waters to the United States, agreed not to tax the lands of the United States for five years after they had gone into private ownership, reserved to herself all salt springs and every sixteenth section for school purposes, besides lands to build her State-house and to endow her university. These were reservations by Alabama, and not gifts of the United States.

Alabama ceded her waste lands, just as Virginia did, to the United States. Without any express reservation, she retained the ownership of the beds of her navigable waters and still holds them, and this because she, as a sovereign, must own all the lands in her borders that she has not expressly ceded.

This law was all settled in Pollard's Lessees vs. Hagan, in 3 Howard's Reports, from which opinion I will read a few extracts. I wish it were permissible for me to read the entire opinion. The question arose in this case as to whether the State was the owner of the borders of the Alabama River between high and low water mark, the river having receded according to some natural events from its former borders, leaving quite a margin there, which the people of Mobile utilized by building on it piers and wharves, and that brought up the question. Say the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice McKinley delivering the opinion:

Although this is the first time we have been called upon to draw the line that separates the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the Government of the Union and the State governments over the subject in controversy, many of the principles which enter into and form the elements of the question have been settled by previous well-considered decisions of this court, to which we shall have occasion to refer in the course of this investigation.

The counsel for the plaintiffs insisted, in argument, that the United States derived title to that part of Alabama in which the land in controversy lies—from the King of Spain; and that they succeeded to all his rights, powers, and jurisdiction over the territory ceded, and therefore hold the land and soil, under navigable waters, according to the laws and usages of Spain; and by those laws and usages the rights of a subject to land derived from the crown could not extend beyond high-water mark, nor navigable waters, without an express grant; and that all alluvion belonged to the crown, and might be granted by this king, together with all land between high water and the channel of such navigable waters; and by the compact between the United States and Alabama, on her admission into the Union, it was agreed that the people of Alabama forever disclaimed all right or title to the waste or unappropriated lands lying within the State, and that the same should remain at the sole disposal of the United States; and that all the navigable waters within the State should forever remain public highways, and free to the citizens of that State and the United States, without any tax, duty, or impost, or toll therefor imposed by that State. That by these articles of the compact the land under the navigable waters and the public domain above high water were alike reserved to the United States, and alike subject to be sold by them; and to give any other construction to these compacts would be to yield up to Alabama and the other new States all the public lands within their limits.

It must be admitted by every lawyer that that was a very strong case, stronger than I think can be cited in the history of any other State in the American Union. The Supreme Court say, commenting upon that argument:

We think a proper examination of this subject will show that the United States never held any municipal sovereignty, jurisdiction, or right of soil in and to the territory of which Alabama or any of the new States were formed, except for temporary purposes, and to execute the trusts created by the acts of the Virginia and Georgia Legislatures, and the deeds of cession executed by them to the United States, and the trusts created by the treaty with the French Republic of the 30th of April, 1803, ceding Louisiana.

That covers the whole field.

All that part of Alabama which lies between the thirty-first and thirty-fifth degrees of north latitude was ceded by the State of Georgia to the United States by deed bearing date the 24th day of April, 1802, which is substantially in all its principles and stipulations like the deed of cession executed by Virginia to the United States on the 1st day of March, 1784, by which she ceded to the United States the territory northwest of the river Ohio.

The court go on then to give the stipulations of the deeds, which I will pass over, and I omit also any attempt to read the argument of the court, coming down to the following statement:

The compact made between the United States and the State of Georgia was sanctioned by the Constitution of the United States, by the third section of the fourth article of which it is declared that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislature of the States concerned, as well as of Congress."

When Alabama was admitted into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, she succeeded to all the rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction, and eminent domain which Georgia possessed at the date of the cession, except so far as this right was diminished by the public lands remaining in the possession and under the control of the United States, for the temporary purposes provided for in the deed of cession and the legislative acts connected with it. Nothing remained to the United States, according to the terms of the agreement, but the public lands. And if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement, granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States, such stipulation would have been void and inoperative, because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain, within the limits of a State or elsewhere, except in the cases in which it is expressly granted.

It might be well for some Senators who are in the habit of setting aside the opinions of all the enlightened men of the country to consider whether or not they can answer at least this statement by the Supreme Court in respect of the power of Congress to exercise a municipal jurisdiction within a State. I take it, sir, the conducting of a school or the providing for the maintenance of a school is very clearly an act of municipal power.

Mr. GEORGE. Have not donations of lands been made by Congress to maintain colleges?

Mr. MORGAN. A donation out of a fund that belongs to the States, certainly; and if Congress consents that a State shall resume its original right, that would scarcely be a donation. I continue the reading of the decision of the Supreme Court:

We will now inquire into the nature and extent of the right of the United States to these lands—

The lands conveyed by these deeds of cession, by the treaty for the purchase of the French territory, and the Spanish treaty under which we acquired Florida—

We will now inquire into the nature and extent of the right of the United States to these lands, and whether that right can in any manner affect or control the decision of the case before us. This right originated in voluntary surrenders, made by several of the old States, of their waste and unappropriated lands to the United States, under a resolution of the old Congress of the 6th of September, 1780, recommending such surrender and cession to aid in paying the public debt incurred by the war of the Revolution. The object of all the parties to these contracts of cession was to convert the land into money for the payment of the debt, and to erect new States over the territory thus ceded; and as soon as these purposes could be accomplished, the power of the United States over these lands, as property, was to cease.

Whenever the United States shall have fully executed these trusts the municipal sovereignty of the new States will be complete throughout their respective borders, and they and the original States will be upon an equal footing in all respects whatever. We, therefore, think the United States hold the public lands within the new States by force of the deeds of cession, and the statutes connected with them, and not by any municipal sovereignty which it may be supposed they possess, or have reserved by compact with the new States, for that particular purpose. The provision of the Constitution above referred to shows that no such power can be exercised by the United States within a State. Such a power is not only repugnant to the Constitution, but it is inconsistent with the spirit and intention of the deeds of cession.

I read now the conclusion of this opinion:

Alabama is therefore entitled to the sovereignty and jurisdiction over all the territory within her limits, subject to the common law, to the same extent that Georgia possessed it before she ceded it to the United States. To maintain any other doctrine is to deny that Alabama has been admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, the Constitution, laws, and compact to the contrary notwithstanding.

* * * * * * * *

By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First. The shores of navigable waters, and the soils under them, were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States, respectively; secondly, the new States have the same right, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States; thirdly, the right of the United States to the public lands, and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof, conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land in controversy in this case. The judgment of the supreme court of the State of Alabama is, therefore, affirmed.

The United States can not even buy a lot of land in Alabama of one of her citizens on which to build a fort without the consent of the Legislature of that State, so strong and exclusive is the sovereignty of Alabama over the territory within her political jurisdiction. And the same is true of every new State that has come into the Union.

They are all equal to the original States in every right.

What then has become of these seven great trust estates ceded to the United States by the States I have named for the benefit of each and all?

Much of it has been donated to the people by the votes of the representatives of the people, and much to works of internal improvement in like manner. Much to schools and universities; much to the States, and much has been sold to the people, and the money has gone into the common Treasury.

In this way all the States have got the benefit of the fund according to the original contracts with the States. Even in the Louisiana purchase and in the treaties with Mexico and Spain the interests of prospective States have been provided for in a like manner.

This ownership of the soil is property of the United States which the Constitution expressly empowers Congress to dispose of. It is property to which there is annexed a use, by contract, which Congress should respect far more than it has done. That use could not be better executed than to apply the lands or their proceeds to the education of the people, nor can better agents be found than the States, to all of whom, as States, the beneficial interest in the lands is expressly reserved—reserved not to the people of the different States, but reserved to the States.

The beneficial use of these lands is not reserved to the people as such, but to the States. Now, can the Senator from Florida show me in the Constitution any such a grant of the taxing power to Congress to raise money for the benefit of the States as I have shown the Senate the grant that does exist under these deeds of cession from the States to the United States of all the public lands in trust for the benefit of the States?

The proposition is too plain for denial or debate, that when we pass the title of land to any private holder we do it as the trustee of the States under a power conferred by the States, and we are compelled to apply that money, if we honorably comply with our obligation, to the uses declared in the deeds of cession. But I will not undertake to amplify a decision which is so entirely plain as that in Pollard's Lessees vs. Hagan. If I was trying this case before a justice of the peace I should think I had established enough to show the distinction between the execution of a trust confided in Congress by a deed of cession made by a State and the power of Congress to tax that people for some other purpose.

I have shown that the whole power of Congress over the public lands ceded by the original States was derived from actual cessions made in trust for the States of the Union; that the power of Congress over these lands came from the States by express grant upon defined conditions. Can he show any grant of similar power to Congress to tax the people at large to raise subsidies for the States?

Before proceeding further in this debate I must most respectfully protest against the assumption of the Committee on Education and Labor that Alabama is a land of darkness, a lazaretto of ignorance, which this committee describes it to be. If we are to be masqueraded here in the garb of a mendicant people, so as to excite the pity of Congress to give us liberal alms—which more resembles the backshish given to an Arab donkey-driver than that healing and comforting benefaction of sweet charity, which the right hand gives without the knowledge of the left hand—let us at least have credit, in our misery, for good intentions and honest efforts to relieve ourselves from this humiliating condition.

The committee say that in 1880, six years ago, the census tables show that we had in Alabama 433,447 people who could not write and were over ten years old. I do not believe this statement. Let us make a few comparisons. In 1860 the census returns credited Alabama with 38,000 people "who can not read and write," and of these 455 were free colored people. That census, in this matter, only related to free people. Massachusetts had in 1860 46,921 illiterates; in 1870 she had 74,935; in 1880 she rose to 92,980. New York in 1860 had 121,878 illiterates; in 1870 she had 163,501, and in 1880 she rose to the dizzy height of 219,600. I do not believe these figures either, but as the bill is based on the census of 1880 I must argue it on that basis. Of the people whom we attempted to educate in Alabama up to 1860 only 38,000 were illiterate. In 1870, after five years of war, and five more of robbery, which was worse than war, during which the school revenues were despoiled almost to annihilation, we come out with 31,001 white female and 17,429 white males over twenty-one who were unable to read and write and 43,629 over ten and under twenty-one. Total of white illiterates, 92,059. The illiteracy of the negroes was then greatly underestimated at 257,712. That census was a mere travesty on the true statistical history of the country.

The census of 1880 is a mere estimate or approximation to the truth. It estimates an illiteracy of 38.1 per cent. of the white race over ten years of age in Alabama. There is not a member in either House of this Congress that does not know that this is a false estimate. In 1880 we had a white population of 662,185 of a total population of 1,262,505; of this number 421,328 were between five and seventeen years old. Our school ages are between seven and twenty-one years, and it is on this basis, and not on the basis of the census of 1880, that we must make our estimate of the illiteracy which we intend to try to cure by law. Now, to say that 38 per cent. even of these persons of school age can not write is certainly a rash statement, whether it is applied to blacks or whites.

The number of persons of school age in Alabama by the latest school census, taken in 1885, was 420,413. Of this number 143,037 white children and 90,872 colored were enrolled as pupils in the public schools. In all 233,909, an increase over the preceding year of 18,331. Our system of education is free, but not compulsory. We paid last year 3,565 teachers of white schools, an increase of 107 teachers, and 1827 teachers of colored schools, an increase of 103. The total school fund for the year 1885 was $511,540.05. This does not include $16,500 for the education of the deaf, dumb, and blind, nor $24,000 paid to the University of Alabama, nor $20,280 to the Agriculture and Mechanical College, in all $60,500, which are included as a part of the expenses of the State government. Nor does it include the sum of more than $50,000 of additions to the educational fund and paid in salaries to the State superintendent and his clerks.

The cost of education is over $600,000 per annum to the people of Alabama, and this is a tax of more than 50 cents per capita upon every human being in the State. A small matter to us, but it is, with the poll-tax, $6 a year to a man with a wife and eight children who may prefer a private or neighborhood school. If this bill proposed to reduce this burden it would at least be humane; but it proposes only to give another sum equal to this, taken from the people by Federal taxation, for eight years, which means forever, so as either to double the number of teachers or to double the amounts of their salaries.

It seems to me that 5,392 teachers of the public schools—1 teacher to 43 pupils—is not a scant allowance.

The people of Alabama and the entire South have always educated their children chiefly in private schools and neighborhood schools. Their expenditures in that way must be twice or three times as great as the sums raised by taxation for public schools. They will be a long time in giving up this favorite plan. They have excellent reasons for this preference which I do not feel called upon to discuss at this time. Christian people always have a care as to how their children are taught and as to who teaches them. For the ordinary expenses of our State government we paid last year $485,126, which does not include $333,723 paid as interest on the public debt.

When we are paying more to schools than we pay to the current ordinary expenses of the State government we are scarcely to be rated among the derelict States that the Senator from New Hampshire berates for their crimes or else commiserates for their poverty. When we are increasing our wealth at the rate of $7,000,000 a year, he need not fear that we will falter in the duty we are so successfully performing of reducing the number of illiterates among our children.

This bill confines its benefits to persons of the school age. It does not propose to educate the ignorant mass of voters over twenty-one who now fill up the ballot-boxes with votes that express nothing but their ignorance and a blind and slavish obedience to the will of their educated leaders and bosses. Being a measure to reform the people so that ignorance shall no longer rule in this great complex system of dual governments, it omits to teach the voter to read and write, and attempts to save the country by teaching his children to read and write. That seems to be a good remedy, but it fails to reach the seat of the disease. Alabama would rather take her chances to relieve the afflicted who are suffering an epidemic of ignorance by the good old remedy of common sense and good nursing than to risk the new doctor among her people with this new patent medicine.

The doctor says he will not come unless he is invited, but that he has the right to come without being called in. I am afraid that if he comes he will never go away. He will set the State up on crutches for eight years, and at the end of that time either the United States or the people of Alabama will have to supply the school system with a new set of props. Its powerful limbs will have shrunk from disuse, and it will falter in a path in which it now marches like a conquering army. The school system, forced into unnatural growth by the stimulus which raises its revenues from $500,000 to a million in a single day, will be the master of the State, and with its organized and organizing power will decree that the State in every policy shall obey its behests. When at the end of eight years the United States withdraw their support, the taxes of the people for the public schools will have to be doubled, or else the schools will go down.

But, it is exclaimed, your people will make money even at that rate of taxation in the increase of the knowledge of reading, writing, and arithmetic. Our State does not want to make the people rich by taxing them. We tried that fifty years ago in our State-bank exploit, and wound up with a debt of $15,000,000, on part of which we are still paying the interest.

We prefer to get rich by having an economical government and allowing our people to enjoy all they can of what they work for and in the way they think best.

The argument as to the policy of this bill is not all on one side.

I read now from the Nation, a weekly paper of high order, established more than twenty years ago in New York.

The article from which I read is headed "Connecticut's warning against the Federal education scheme."

All the pleas for Federal aid proceed upon the assumption that such aid will be a good thing for the South. It is this assumption which we combat. We maintain that the worst thing which could befall the cause of education in the South would be a series of liberal appropriations from the national Treasury for a series of years. We mean, of course, the worst thing in the long run, for no judgment upon such a matter is of any value which is not based upon a long look ahead. We are ready to admit that more Southern voters might be able to read ten years hence if $100,000,000 should be appropriated by Congress for use chiefly in Southern schools than if the States were left to their own resources; but we insist that this temporary gain in intelligence would be purchased at the cost of a permanent loss in character vastly more important—the loss of self-reliance and self-respect.

One fact counts for more than a volume of theorizing, and it is, therefore, most fortunate that the demoralizing influence of outside school funds can be conclusively demonstrated from the experience of one of the oldest States in the Union. When Connecticut sold her Western Reserve lands the proceeds were devoted to a school fund, in the expectation that this assistance would serve materially to elevate the standard of public education. The fund proved very productive, the income during the early part of this century varying from $70,000 to $100,000 a year, which was a large sum of money for a small State in those days, when the cost of maintaining schools was so much less than now. Before they had this outside income the people of Connecticut supported their schools entirely by taxation, just as the people of the South are doing now. What was the effect of receiving this assistance? The answer shall be furnished by Mr. C. D. Hine, secretary of the State board of education, a recognized authority in the matters of which he speaks:

"The school fund derived from the sale of Western lands yielded an income last year of $120,855, which amounts to 80 cents for each person of the school age. The average expense of educating each of these persons throughout the State is $10.31, so that the fund now furnishes about 8 per cent. of the total cost. In those towns and cities where the people insist upon good schools no reliance is placed upon these permanent funds. Indeed, the history of our State shows conclusively that at the time when the fund was most productive, yielding $1.40 or $1.50 for each person of the school age, and when towns depended upon it, as they generally did, for the support of their schools, the schools themselves were poor and short. In fact, this was the darkest period of our educational experience. A very striking deterioration took place as soon as the fund became productive and the income began to be distributed. Before that period schools had been maintained at least six months, and at most nearly the whole year, according to the size of the district. After, and not long after, this new source of income was opened, the usual length of schools was reduced to only three months, or just the time that this fund would maintain the schools. The sums which came as gratuities relieved the people of responsibility and deadened their interest, until the schools were continued only so long as the charity lasted. Happily the danger from this direction is past and can not return. The fund has probably reached its greatest productiveness, and the per capita will constantly decrease. The public schools must draw their sustenance from the people who are directly or indirectly benefited by them."

The Blair bill simply proposes to do for the whole South what the Western Reserve fund did for Connecticut. Human nature is much the same everywhere, and if one were to try differentiating it, he certainly would not find the Southern character less likely to be demoralized by subsidies than the Northern. The men who had this fund set apart for the benefit of Connecticut's schools undoubtedly thought that they were doing the State a great service; but it has proved a curse, and the people are now congratulated that "the danger from this direction is past," because the growth of population has forced them to tax themselves in order to educate their children. The Christian Union and the people who share its opinion that Federal appropriations for Southern education would be simply "the payment of a debt due by justice," are honest in their desire to benefit the South; but if they could accomplish their design they would have proved its worst enemies.

The truth is that the South can educate herself, and is already beginning to do so. It will be a hard job, but her people, black and white, will be more manly, more self-reliant, more intelligent, in the long run, if they are left to work out their own salvation. The most hopeful sign for the South's future is that clear-headed Southern men are protesting against the efforts of well-meaning but short-sighted Northerners to give the South school money out of the Federal Treasury, which these Southern men see that she ought to raise and can raise herself.

Mr. President, that is "the sober second thought" of Connecticut, and that article is based upon the experience of more than one hundred years. Connecticut having sold her Western Reserve in Ohio for money which she made the basis of her school system, relieving her people from all taxation and from all necessity of using energetic means to organize a good and sound school system, she finds herself at last really damaged by this great endowment, and she is appealing to her own people to go to work and strengthen their own sinews, so as to master the difficulties of life as they arise and to let the Southern people alone and let them do the same thing. I wish that that writer had known in respect to my State that she is gathering wealth upon a value of assessment (which we all know is very much lower than the actual value of property) at the rate of $7,000,000 a year. Then he would have understood that there was a strong, courageous, powerful, and dutiful people that are engaged there in a work to which they are thoroughly committed and with which they are much in love, so much indeed that they spend more money every year for schools than they do for the current expenses of the State government. That is progress enough for me. I confess, sir, that I am not in favor of going too fast with anything. I would rather go a little slow and keep inside of the line of the Constitution.

I would also read an article from the Morning Star, a paper published in North Carolina—very able—if I had the attention of the Senate, though I run some risk in it, because that editor is rash enough to call this bill the "paternal pedagogue" bill, and I think he has a remarkably good name for it.

When the Senate adjourned on Thursday I had commenced to discuss the proposition that this bill, if enacted into a law, will be a great and dangerous abuse of the taxing power confided to Congress by the Constitution. I had read from decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, of which there are many, that declare that this is the most dangerous power that Congress can exert—the power to destroy, even when unlimited or unrestrained, and that the framers of the Constitution must have intended to place checks and restraints upon this power which would at least preserve the people from destruction.

It is utterly absurd and inconceivable that men who had fought at Concord and Bunker Hill before a Congress existed because the Parliament of Great Britain had asserted the right to tax them, and had organized a rebellion and defended their new government until it struggled to its feet as a free, sovereign, and independent power, fighting and suffering as few people have ever done—that they should, after all that, deliberately place in their organic law a grant of power to Congress or to any body of men to tax them "to the utmost" for any purpose that Congress might in its discretion hold to be necessary or proper "to promote the general welfare."

No written constitution in any State of this Union or of any free country in the world has ever contained such a grant of power to any legislative tribunal. The most despotic autocrat that rules in any civilized country would feel that his scepter was a mockery when compared with a grant of power like that which is claimed for Congress.

Here are Republicans and Democrats claiming this absolutism in Congress as a doctrine bequeathed to us from fathers who had suffered for many decades and had fought for six years to restrain the power of taxation within bounds that would not be fatal to liberty.

I will read again to the Senate the statement of that bold and dangerous heresy as it is written in the report of the Committee on Education and Labor and as it is crystallized in this bill.

In the last report made to the Senate, the one which we are now discussing, accompanying this bill, the committee say:

The report referred to—

Made by the same committee at the former session—

The report referred to, and hereby adopted by your committee, is as follows.

Now I read extracts—

Our leading proposition is that the General Government possesses the power and has imposed upon itself the duty of educating the people of the United States whenever for any cause those people are deficient in that degree of education which is essential to the discharge of their duties as citizens either of the United States or of the several States wherein they chance to reside.

Again:

Now, the right of self-defense, which is the right of self-preservation, is the right to live and to be. The right of the people to be at all implies and includes the right to constitute and maintain the state—that is to say, government—and to prescribe its form, for human existence is impossible without government. The governing power must know how to govern or it can not govern. Can a man do that which he knows not how to do? The people have distributed the functions of government between the national and sectional or the State authorities, and have retained in themselves the initial exercise of all power through the ballot. The ballot is the republican form of government both in the nation and in the State.

I read again:

But Congress has express power "to provide for the general welfare of the United States," and to exert its utmost power of taxation to promote that which was one of the six greatest ends enumerated in the preamble, and to secure which the Constitution itself was ordained and established by the whole people of the United States of America. That people well understood that without intelligence it would be impossible "to preserve the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity." It goes without argument to say that in no way can the general welfare be so promoted as by the general diffusion of knowledge and the discipline of the mental powers of the masses of the people, which can be accomplished by common schools maintained by governmental power.

I read again:

Only ignorance is convertible into brute force. Ignorance is slavery. But for ignorance there would have been no slave. But for ignorance among the nominally free there would have been no rebellion. The contest we now wage is with that still unconquered ignorance of both white man and black man in all parts of the country which hurried us by remorseless fate to fields of death four long years. Besides this, we confront the demands of hordes incoming from beyond both great oceans, and of the advancing generations of men.

I do wonder if any man who was ever in the confederate congress or in the confederate army or in any way identified with that period of trial and strife among the people of the South read that report and permitted it to go upon this record to disgrace the country.

But for ignorance among the nominally free there would have been no rebellion.

Was it the ignorance of New England that brought slaves into this country and sent them all over this land? No, sir; it was the wealth and the power, it was the luminous intelligence of those people that caused them to go abroad, capture slaves in Africa, bring them here, and sell them to the people of the South.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. I am reading, but I will hear of course.

Mr. GEORGE. Does not the Senator know that no member of the committee is responsible for the argument of the report but the chairman?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that I did not wish to get up a controversy in the committee; but I read in this last report:

The report referred to, and hereby adopted by your committee, is as follows.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to read an extract from that report:

The committee unanimously approve the amount proposed to be appropriated in the bill and its distribution on the basis of illiteracy, and a majority recommend its passage in its present form.

The matter following is largely from a presentation of the subject made by the chairman of the committee on a former occasion, for which, as matter of argument, the committee as a whole is not responsible, but the statistical tables and calculations having been prepared with considerable labor and care, and being substantially unchanged by later information, the same is incorporated with this supplementary report.

I merely desire to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that the chairman in presenting this report distinctly stated that the committee was not responsible for the argument which he made in it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, this bill passed before without any such statement as that. This report has been two years before the people of the United States without any disclaimer from any member of that committee.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will permit me to say that the disclaimer is in the original report.

Mr. MORGAN. I speak of the report without any disclaimer of the argument. I think if I had been on the committee that reported a bill which contained this language about the people of my country I should have found it out:

The contest we now wage is with that still unconquered ignorance of both white man and black man in all parts of the country which hurried us by remorseless fate to fields of death four long years.

I have often heard it said that the people in the South were a hoodwinked and blinded set of slaves who were led into secession and into battle by their leaders; but, sir, I deny that. The people of the South forced their leaders into the struggle, and many a poor cowardly heart then beating in the bosom of a so-called leader would have shrunk back, but that he knew he did not dare to do so in the presence of an enlightened and splendid people. That is the truth of history.

Here goes this bill and this argument uncontradicted, and I am even reproached for trying to defend the people whom I have the honor in part to represent here against this attack upon their honor and intelligence. I am expected to look at the sunlight of this blazing seventy-seven millions of burnished gold and become blind to all else in the world, like a child looking at the sun for a moment and afterward is unable to see the countenance of his mother who stands by his side.

Some of the members of the committee say they never read that report, others say that they do not state this doctrine it that way; but in their speeches and in this bill those of the committee who have spoken all agree that this measure rests solely on the ground that it is intended and calculated "to promote the general welfare," and that the Constitution expressly confers upon Congress the power to promote the general welfare by the utmost exercise of the taxing power. They are all agreed on that point; nobody dissents from that proposition. I have stated it correctly and fairly. The chairman of the committee, as I understand his position, is not agreed with the Senator from Mississippi, who says this bill makes "a pure gift to the State upon condition subsequent."

The view of the Senator from New Hampshire is that it is an appropriation for a governmental purpose of the United States, in which the State is made a trustee, with liberty to accept or decline the trust. But if the trust is accepted, it must be executed in the manner and for the special uses declared in the act. The State becomes, in his view, the agent of the United States to apply and expend the appropriation, with no discretion as to the persons, within the school age, who are to have the benefits of the money appropriated, with no discretion as to the equality of all as to the privileges and school facilities to be enjoyed by each, with no power to pass a law which would change or contravene this act of Congress.

It is the United States that educates the child in pursuance of a right which the Senator on last Thursday, with much thoughtful deliberation, thus defined:

> If the State proper fails, as well as the parent, to educate the child which is to become a citizen, not alone of the State, but of the United States, it then becomes the right of the General Government, in self-defense, to educate that child.

That condition of self-defense which justifies this emergent legislation is now upon us, according to the agreement of all the advocates of this bill. That is to say, there are ignorant masses of children in the whole country, in all the States. Their parents have failed to educate them, and the States to which they belong have failed to educate them, and thereupon the United States, in order to defend the Government against an ignorance that the Senator from New Hampshire said was not less dangerous to the country than the yellow fever, has the right to educate them.

The right of self-defense is the doctrine of this bill, according to that Senator. It is a war doctrine, "Salus reipublicæ est suprema lex"—the safety of the republic is the supreme law. The Senator feels that the Government is assailed by the spirit of the powers of darkness, and it is time to stand on the defensive. This invading eclipse of the mental powers of some of the people of some of the States will destroy the Republic, as the Senator thinks, unless its baleful shadow is turned to light. Who is to blame for it? First, the parents of these miserable children; second, the States, that have turned their backs upon the poor sufferers and have wickedly neglected the first duties of humanity.

New York, that great Empire State, that has given us a President, and for twenty-five years has always managed to furnish us with a candidate, and will give us another, even from this floor, if the fates are propitious and if no mistakes are made—New York with an annual revenue in 1880 of $14,040,921 from the State and counties and $42,352,053 from the cities and towns, in all $56,392,975, on an estimated value of $2,651,940,000 of property, has 219,600 of these poor ignorant wretches who can not write. Is this a pitiable misfortune, that a State so rich should be so derelict, or is it a crime? I fear it must be considered a crime. I fear the Senator from New Hampshire so regards it.

New York, that derives wealth from every source; that levies tribute on all the people; that absorbs alike the substance of the fertile lands of the valley of the Mississippi and of the arid deserts of Arizona; that, like a Florida orange tree, sucks the rich sweet juices from the sands, and, with sweeter adulation, wins fruit with golden glories from the sun—New York, it seems, is to get $2,721,066.98 for its failure to disperse this army of 219,600 of unlettered vandals, who threaten the very existence of the Government, according to the Senator from New Hampshire.

You reward New York for her dereliction, while you soothe Alabama for the sufferings you suppose that she endures because of her virtuous poverty.

I have silently wondered whether the Senators from New York and our New York President could find it in their hearts to take this great sum for that great State in payment for this great evil for which New York is responsible, and which threatens so seriously this great Government.

This is surely a wonderful bill, which with the same good motive and in the same section dispenses millions to Alabama to alleviate her misfortunes and millions to New York to reward her crimes.

A partial apology for New York and a fitting preamble to this bill might be found in Pope's couplet:

> God sends not ill, if rightly understood;
> All partial ill is universal good.

New York, that is to get under this bill $2,721,066.98, and Pennsylvania, that is to get $2,825,324.98, because they have neglected the calls of humanity to that degree that they have together 457,614 people who can not write, are to be rewarded, I suppose, for having furnished this "dreadful example" which enables this committee "to point a moral," and so convert this partial evil into universal good.

Mr. President, our ship of state is wearing toward a dangerous lee-shore when we begin to vote gifts and subsidies to States that have been dissevered or made bankrupt or impoverished during our civil war.

Virginia has but little more than half her territory left, and is liable for a debt of more than $30,000,000, contracted before the war. Shall we make a gift to Virginia of enough money to meet half her debt or all of it?

Other Southern States are not paying the interest on all the bonds they have issued, and the people of the United States are interested in the question whether all or any of the States shall pay their obligations. Shall we assume them?

We can not coerce these States by acts of Congress to pay these debts. Must they go unpaid, and leave the people to suffer in the face of that benevolent provision that Congress may provide for the general welfare?

It is a favorite theory of some Senators from the North that the people of the seceding States were forced by their State governments and by conscriptions enacted by the confederate congress to make war on the United States. Indeed, that theory is boldly asserted in this report, that the people suffered because the States were wickedly derelict; that poverty, wretchedness, disease, wounds, and mutilations have caused many of them to die, leaving children in beggary and others to linger in the throes of a miserable existence. Indeed, "the quality of mercy," which is said to abound in this measure, seems to derive much of its good from the thought of educating the children of the poor maimed confederate soldiers.

It is not for me to extend the argument beyond this field to that of pensioning the confederate soldiers, for I do not believe in creating claims upon the Government out of our sympathies and our feelings of benevolence where the Government is under no express obligation to pay them.

If I believed in that manner of creating obligations by act of Congress that never before had any existence, and are not supported by any service rendered the Government, I could not restrain my desire, from any motives of policy, to take care of my honored comrades in the confederate army. I would instantly fly to their relief. But I must say to them and to you that Congress has no power to create such an obligation on the Government of the United States either to support them or to educate their children in the States, and therefore I must decline to do either. It is a hard declaration for me to make, but I have sworn to support the Constitution, and I intend to do it if I know how.

But I will dwell no longer on this attempt to do two wrongs in order to secure one right—a wrong to Alabama to tax her people to pay the people of New York and Pennsylvania for the delinquency of their own rich States in failing to educate their children, and a wrong to the people of New York and Pennsylvania in taxing them to raise a gift for the people of Alabama to relieve them from an ignorance that they are supposed to be too poor to dispel.

The first of these wrongs the Senator from New Hampshire insists shall be requited by an appropriation for the benefit of the people who have been wronged by the States of New York and Pennsylvania; while the Senator from Mississippi insists that the money is a pure gift to the delinquent State upon a condition subsequent.

The Senator from New Hampshire has shaped his bill and his report so as to meet his own view. The Senator from Mississippi takes the opposite view of the bill, and claims that it makes a gift to the States—a perfect gift in præsenti of all the money that the State may ever get hold of under this bill; a gift that vests in the donor whenever it is accepted, but may be forfeited by failure to comply with a condition subsequent. If the State having the money in hand should, by law or by the fault of her officers, divert it to other purposes or violate the precatory trust found in this act, there would be no remedy found in the United States laws to recover back a dollar of it or to punish any State officer for the abuse of his trust. In such a case the United States could only pocket the loss and the affront with the best grace possible and shut its Treasury vaults against any other demand of the defaulting State, at least until all the wrong done was righted and all the contempt of the State toward the United States was expurgated.

That is a fair statement of and deduction from the position of the Senator from Mississippi.

But the Senator from New Hampshire holds always to the true theory of his bill. He tolerates the theory of a gift to the State, on condition subsequent, to satisfy the Senators from the South, leading Democrats who follow Mr. Calhoun, as they say, and hug the theory of the sovereignty of the States as being the safest, because it is equal to any duty of preventing the United States from controlling this money after the States have actually received it. The sudden and hopeful reunion of the two classes of Senators on a given result makes them too proud and happy to consent that any question shall now divide them that can possibly be postponed.

But the Senator from New Hampshire looks well to the rear, and keeps his bridges in good order and under guard.

He puts into the bill this clause at the end of the closing section:

And the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

Was not this the law, without the necessity of re-enacting it? It was and is the law, on the theory of this bill that is supported by the Senator from New Hampshire. He insists that Congress is the power that is educating the children, as it has the right to do this in self-defense against ignorance, and that the laws of the United States, including all the provisions of this act, follow the money into the States, and control it there, in accordance with this act, until it reaches the objects of the grant, the children, and accomplishes the purpose of the grant in their education.

But according to the theory of the Senator of Mississippi, which I have several times stated in his own language, that "it is a pure gift to the State, on condition subsequent," this clause, that reserves the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act, annexes as another condition to the gift the power of Congress to revoke it. It is not a vested gift, if Congress chooses to revoke it, and Congress may annex other conditions to the gift if it chooses. The power to modify this act so as to control the gift, or to revoke it, is an express power reserved to Congress in this bill to continue its control over the gift after it has been paid over to the State and after the State officers have begun to execute the trust. Congress reserves in this clause of the act all the power it now possesses over the entire subject, and the States can not disregard the will of Congress and escape its power of compelling obedience to its will in every matter connected with the entire subject.

Congress can repeal or amend any section of this bill, even those that define the objects and the fundamental nature of the gift, under this express reservation of power, and ask the State no question as to its will as to any supposed vested rights of the State, or its opinion or sentiment as to any asserted obligation of honor or duty resting on Congress in respect of this alleged gift.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator at that point to allow me to make a suggestion. If the position be true that this bill is a gift in præsenti to the States subject to the control of the States, how can gentlemen so holding answer the position taken by the chairman of the committee when the bill was up before, that if Congress has the power to make the appropriation Congress has the power to direct its application? Has that been answered?

Mr. MORGAN. Never.

Mr. MAXEY. It can not be.

Mr. MORGAN. It can not be. The honorable Senator from Texas and myself have spent the better part of our lives in our efforts to try to protect and defend what we believe to be the constitutional rights of the great body of the people, and since the struggle ended, where we were compelled to witness the slaughter of brother by brother, we passed through what was called the period of reconstruction, the terrors of which, the evils of which, the disasters of which were far greater than any struggles in battle that the soldiers of either army endured; and if this bill passes we shall be called upon while we yet remain in the Senate under our present commissions to discuss before this body many of the very questions of the most exciting character that we have ever had to encounter, and we shall see the people of the South and the people of the North again aroused to the utmost frenzy of excitement by the questions this bill will bring back to Congress. Never, sir, was there a more disastrous invasion of the public peace than is contained in this bill.

If Congress should hereafter choose to repeal the clauses in the bill as to non-sectarian schools, or as to discriminations on account of color, I can easily see that questions of the most exciting character would at once arise between the States and the United States.

The danger that such questions might be stirred up in some of the States just preceding a Presidential election, which would result in a demand for the repeal of either of these features of this bill, and the dangerous character of such a debate in Congress on a bill to repeal these parts of this act, is too obvious to be overlooked.

I will not now dwell upon this matter further than to say that in South Carolina and Mississippi, where it is alleged that the negro race have a majority, we can not avoid a struggle of the negro race for a repeal by Congress of the many clauses in this bill that empower the States to exclude their children from the schools where the children of white people are being taught. I could suggest very many questions that are dangerous in their nature which lie so near the surface of this sea of trouble that the most ignorant negro can and will fish them up and drag them into Congress.

They can demand repeal, alteration, and amendment under this clause, and they will do it, and Congress will be compelled to listen to their demand. We expressly reserve this right to them and their representatives in this clause. This clause is a real Pandora's box, and once it is opened it will reinstate what was once aptly called "an organized hell" in the Southern States and in Congress. The power of man, the virtue of man can not prevent it. These gentlemen, for a few glittering dollars out of the Treasury of the United States given in charity to the South, are throwing open that door and inviting our people to pass again beneath the rod of affliction.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly I believe in the clause that reserves the power to Congress. It need not be characterized by harsh language. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say but a few moments ago that that was a power which would have existed without any express reservation.

Mr. MORGAN. On the theory of the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GEORGE. In that I agree. It is pure surplusage in the bill. Congress has the right to amend, to alter, to repeal any bill that it may pass that does not amount in itself to a contract; and as to that I doubt.

Mr. MORGAN. As to that I doubt whether the Senator——

Mr. BLAIR rose.

Mr. MORGAN. I have to deal with one of these Senators at a time. The Senator from New Hampshire will excuse me.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to say a word.

Mr. MORGAN. They are so opposite in their views and yet they are so concurrent in the result that I am compelled to deal with them separately.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not care to express any views now.

Mr. MORGAN. I will not yield at this moment.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator decline to listen to a statement of facts?

Mr. MORGAN. At this moment. I will yield the floor in a few minutes.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not know it would be disagreeable to the Senator to listen to a fact at this time.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not like when the Senator from Mississippi has put a question to me to have the Senator from New Hampshire interfere to prevent my answering it. Upon the theory of this bill claimed by the Senator from New Hampshire it was not necessary to put this feature in the bill. Why? Because he claims that it is an appropriation made by the power of Congress and kept under the power of Congress, and the right of Congress to follow an appropriation made by such power and kept under such control no lawyer can deny. But the theory of the Senator from Mississippi that it is a pure gift to the State on condition subsequent makes it necessary, in order to control the management of that gift after it is entered upon by the donee, that there should be an express reservation of the power to control it in the event that the donor desires to control it. When a right vests under an act of Congress, if I understand anything about the law, Congress afterward has no power to change it or take it away.

The Senator from Mississippi claims a vested right to the money when it goes into the hands of the State. He provides no remedy in this bill by which the State shall be accountable in præsenti for the manner of its management. No court can control the State; but this reservation of power to alter, amend, or repeal will enable Congress to do it. The gift carries with it all the rights of a vested title after it has vested. But for this provision nobody could question whether the State had dealt rightfully or wrongfully with it until you came to the next payment, and then the condition subsequent would operate, not to divest the former gift, but to prevent its continuance during the next seven years.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator from Alabama mean to be understood that under the bill as it now stands after an annual appropriation has been actually received by a State under the terms of the bill Congress may then interpose and make a change with reference to the disposition of that money already received?

Mr. MORGAN. If you put in this expression, "power to alter, amend, and repeal," certainly. Who can deny it? That is what it is put there for; and if the honorable Senator from Mississippi has never found that in the bill he had better go and study it, for it is a dangerous subject.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not been able to find anything in the bill that is not in it, as the Senator from Alabama has.

Mr. MORGAN. I am looking after things in this bill. That is my business. I have found this clause, and I want to know what is the use of it. What purpose does it subserve? If the Senator from New Hampshire is right that this is an appropriation continuing under the power of Congress, then of course Congress ought to have the right and has the right under the law to alter, amend, or repeal. But if it is a vested gift, if you want to reserve the right to control the management of that gift after it has vested, you must put this power into the bill, and that you have done. There is not a lawyer in the South who does not understand that, nor in the North either.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I can not hear all he says.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very sorry. I am speaking at the top of my bent.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I want to ask the Senator whether the power to enact a law does not always imply the power to amend, alter, or repeal it; and whether we could remove that difficulty unless we were to make it a part of the Constitution? I understand that we are just enacting a law here that Congress can alter, amend, or repeal.

Mr. MORGAN. I adopted the rather unusual course for me, in this debate, of writing the argumentative part of my speech, in order that I might not be led off into a harangue about questions that are entirely inapplicable and inappropriate. I therefore beg the Senators to allow me to proceed.

If the negro race has a real enemy in the United States he should be here to vote for this bill. This clause is a necessary part of any law of Congress that does not confer a vested right on somebody—an irrevocable right—and needs not to be expressed in such an act. In all executory enactments which do not affect some vested right the power to alter, amend, and repeal the law can not even be waived by Congress. This last clause in the act only expresses a right that Congress possesses and can not waive if it has the power to enact this law. But, being expressed in the act, it fixes the character and definition of this alleged "pure gift to the States on condition subsequent," and shows that it is not a vested right in the States; no, not for one instant of time, and most certainly not for eight consecutive years to come.

This is all executory or prospective legislation, to begin an experiment of a new and alarming character—an innovation involving a principle once discussed and rejected when the men who framed the Constitution were in Congress. The Senator from New Hampshire has in this debate announced most deliberately that appropriations must be made from year to year to keep this scheme alive, and the bill contains many grounds of forfeiture of the right of a State to participate in its benefits in whole or in part, and requires the State whose right has been suspended to appeal to Congress, and not to the courts, for relief against his decision.

When the Secretary of the Interior under this bill decides against the right of a State to receive a second and third installment of this money, the State has no power under the bill to appeal to the courts and ask for a writ of mandamus to compel him to pay the money, although he has made a false judgment; but the bill requires that the State shall come to Congress. Why so? Expressly in order to keep the key in the hand of Congress, that Congress after the gift has vested may alter its purpose and alter the conditions upon which it was taken.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me a word, if it does not interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. It does interrupt me.

Mr. GEORGE. Go on.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New Hampshire is right in holding that this is an executory and repealable law, and the Senator from Mississippi is wrong in saying that this law is "a pure gift to the States on condition subsequent," which means a right vested under the law, and not revocable except in pursuance of the condition expressed in the act.

Is this a gift to the States? Can Congress make a gift of money from the Treasury to the States? We all agree that a gift requires the act of a competent donor in giving and the act of a competent donee in receiving. Without the concurrence of both parties the gift can not be made.

Can Congress treat with a State as to the exercise within the State of any power of government extending over the entire State which otherwise it would not possess? The answer is obviously that it can not so treat with a State, for if it could Congress might engage with a State to abandon every function of government and relapse into the condition of a province of the United States, and this point was decided in Pollard's Lessees vs. Hagan, from which I have read.

It is well that we should settle now, and, if possible, forever, as a matter of policy if not of law, that Congress has no right to make a gift from the Treasury to a State.

If one "pure gift" may be so made any impure gift may also be made, and the statement of this proposition conveys its full meaning and with it the conception of its direful results to any mind that comprehends it. It needs neither argument nor illustration to describe its fearful dangers. Congress must get the consent of the States to make gifts to them, which implies, of necessity, that the gift is not made in virtue of any right or power of government residing in Congress; but when you go on in your bill and require the State to account to Congress directly, and when in the last clause you put it in the power of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal the gift, thereby changing the condition subsequent, and invidiously I fear so put that power in the hands of Congress, you put the State where Congress can put its hand of power upon its throat.

Having shown, as I think, that the Senator from New Hampshire has given the true interpretation to this measure, and has made in the report of the committee the full statement and exposition of the alleged power of Congress on which this measure must rest if it has any support in the Constitution, I will return to the discussion of the question whether this bill has the support of the Constitution. I will read again from the same text—the report—

> But Congress has express power "to provide for the general welfare of the United States," and to exert its utmost power of taxation to promote that which was one of the six greatest ends enumerated in the preamble, and to secure which the Constitution itself was ordained and established by the whole people of the United States of America.

Here are "the six greatest ends enumerated in the preamble of the Constitution," as stated in the report of the committee, namely: First, "to form a more perfect Union;" second, "to establish justice;" third, to "insure domestic tranquillity;" fourth, to "provide for the common defense;" fifth, "to promote the general welfare;" sixth, "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Are these the true definitions and boundaries of the scope of the taxing power within which Congress "has express power to provide for the general welfare of the United States" (not the people) "and to exert its utmost power of taxation," as is alleged in this report?

This statement, upon which the whole theory of this bill rests and upon which the committee have twice deliberately placed it, reverses the Constitution in its theory, transposes its arrangement, by making the preamble to the Constitution the enacting clause of all its ordinances, and by converting all its limitations and restraints upon the powers of Congress as to taxation into mere recitals of methods by which its powers were to be exerted. The committee then crowns its assault on the Constitution by giving to Congress "the utmost power of taxation" that may, in its discretion, be needful to accomplish either of these "six greatest ends" recited in the preamble. If one of these ends can thus be accomplished in this way all of them can.

Not even the abolitionists, kindled with a zeal for human liberty that would brook no opposition, claimed the right to secure "the blessings of liberty" to our slaves, or to enforce the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence that "all men are created equal," or would resort to the preamble of the Constitution in order to find there the power of Congress to abolish slavery, and thus to give liberty to millions and to promote the general welfare of all the people of the United States.

They felt that this power was not in the preamble to the Constitution, nor in the body of it. They denounced the Constitution as a covenant with death and a league with hell, and they resorted to a "higher law" as the means and justification of their end.

Let us not in our efforts at benevolence, in order to restore the wounds of a great civil war, assume a power that the wildest and most determined zealots for human liberty refused to recognize or to touch.

In considering this new and fatal assault on the liberties of the people, this crusade for education, waged against the fetters which the people have placed on the hands of Congress to restrain taxation, the results are so obviously absurd that I will be pardoned for pointing out a few of them.

The first of the "six greatest ends" which the committee have discovered among the powers expressly conferred on Congress in the preamble to the Constitution, is "to form a more perfect union," an event that was consummated when nine of the thirteen States had ratified the Constitution.

Can Congress exert its "utmost power of taxation" in continuing to make the union more perfect than the Constitution made it?

Can Congress expel a refractory State from the Union or one that will not levy taxes to support its Government, in order to make the Union more perfect?

The second of "the six greatest ends" is to establish justice. Can Congress levy taxes to create a court superior to the Supreme Court to do justice in a matter where it feels that this supreme tribunal has done some injustice to somebody, and thereby "establish justice?"

If the President unjustly removes a man from office can Congress reinstate him or tax the people to raise money to continue his salary, and thereby establish justice?

Can Congress insure domestic tranquillity by voting taxes to raise money to banish States from the Union or people from the country?

Can we banish the Mormons to Mexico to "insure the domestic tranquillity" of Utah and station the Army or the militia or the police forces or the posse comitatus along the frontier to keep them out? Can we tax the people for this one of "the six great ends" of this all-comprehending, all-powerful preamble?

It is in this preamble that the committee find a warrant for every excess, every usurpation, every tyranny that the legislative power may, in its discretion, choose to practice against the liberties of a free people.

Another of the six great ends is to secure "the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." This is the greatest of the six ends, and should be assisted by the utmost power of taxation that Congress possesses. But no power of taxation should be employed to destroy these blessings, or to pollute their fountain, or to destroy their citadel established in the Constitution.

What is our liberty? An untutored Indian, fresh from the plains, on a first visit to New York, saw the seething multitudes that throng Broadway, where the richest goods are hauled in open vans, where women and children are guarded over the street crossings by watchful policemen, and where every human right is respected and none are overlooked or violated. He was a child of liberty, in its most unfettered meaning, and he loved the thought that his wild liberty was a boon for which his life was always ready to be offered up. But, gazing on that multitude, all free, and yet all under the restraints of law, he discovered the truth and grandeur of the blessings of liberty secured by law, and, turning to his companion, he exclaimed, "Law is liberty!"

If this committee have forgotten this, let them go to Standing Bear, a Ponca Indian, and learn of him the true lesson of liberty. Let them not trifle with "the blessings of liberty" by claiming for Congress the right to make new definitions of what they shall be, so as to claim new powers in the name of liberty.

Next to the shelter the Constitution gives to our lives, the most important protection we have against the power of Congress is the limitation on their powers to tax the people.

This bill in its principles, in its framework, and by the report of the committee, now twice thrust upon the attention of Congress and the people, claims the "utmost power of Congress" first to decide that any of "the six greatest ends" of the preamble of the Constitution "require to be promoted;" second, that the means of promoting the same are such as Congress in its discretion may provide; and, third, that the people must foot the bill which Congress decrees shall be taxed out of them to accomplish these ends.

This means only that the power of Congress to tax the people is unlimited when the taxes are required to promote the ends that Congress believes are found in the preamble to the Constitution, and that the enumerated and restricted powers granted to Congress in the body of the Constitution are only so many prefaces to indicate the great purposes of government, to provide for which unlimited powers are expressly conferred in the preamble to the Constitution.

I do not ask if this is what the committee means. It is avowed in elaborate statement and argument in their report and it is the very foundation of the bill. I only remark that this view of the Constitution takes away all shelter from our liberties as they are written in the Constitution. No restraint or guarantee is left to protect the people against the taxing power of Congress. This fatal attack on liberty is justified in the name of liberty, and the people of the South are to be induced to submit to the invasion of their real liberties by glittering offers of advantage over other sections more heavily taxed and less amply endowed with this largess drawn from the Treasury of the country.

In support of the point that this law is an unconstitutional abuse of the taxing power I will read an extract from a lecture delivered by Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, in February of this year, to the law school of Georgetown University:

We hear much nowadays about the so-called "general-welfare clause" of the Constitution. The Constitution uses the words general welfare in just two places, and no more. In the preamble the promotion of the general welfare is one of the objects enumerated, along with five others, for which the people of the United States ordain and establish the Constitution. The wildest and most latitudinarian constructionist would hardly venture to tell an audience of intelligent law students that the preamble of the Constitution contains any grant of power. It simply asserts the grand objects which the people aimed to secure by the Constitution, but as to the means by which they do secure these desirable objects we must look into the body of the Constitution and among its enumerated powers.

Looking into the body of the instrument we come upon the first clause of the eighth section of Article I of the Constitution, which contains the grant of the taxing power. Here the words general welfare are used again; and, strange to say, there are persons who suppose that this clause contains a grant of authority to tax in order to promote the personal welfare of every man, woman, and child in the United States! I shall merely counsel you to analyze the clause and see how strange this notion is. The clause grants to the Congress a power to tax the people for three special purposes: First, to pay the debts of the United States; second, to provide for the common defense of the United States; third, to provide for the general welfare of the United States.

In every one of these special purposes for which the taxing power is to be exercised "the United States" means the political corporation known as the United States, and not the individual inhabitants of the country. The debts that are to be paid are the debts of the Government; the common defense that is to be provided for is the defense of the Government in all those matters in which it has duties of defense to discharge for the whole country; the general welfare that is to be provided for is the well-being of the Government in all those matters of which it has special cognizance and in respect to which its efficiency concerns the whole Union. In the very next clause, which contains the grant of power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, the "United States" is used in the same sense, meaning the Government known as the United States. It is on the credit of the Government, not on the credit of individuals or of States, that Congress is authorized to borrow money.

Now look at the stupendous communism that is wrapped up in the taxing power, on the supposition that it includes a power to tax for the promotion of the welfare of individuals. There is no limit to the taxing power, excepting that duties, imposts, and excises must be uniform throughout the United States. All the property in the country may be taxed without limit for the legitimate objects of taxation. If one of those legitimate objects is the welfare of individuals, or masses, or classes, or of the whole people, the two Houses of Congress and any President acting together can divide up all the property in the country upon the plea that a general division will promote the general welfare. By this process this Government could devour itself, and there would be nothing left for it to subsist upon.

That was a dispassionate lecture by a great lawyer from the North before a body of law students in which he was expounding to them as a lawyer and friend the elementary principles of the Constitution. I hail that man as the friend and defender of his country. He was not arguing upon a bill that contained $77,000,000, but he was trying to plant in the minds of those young men the essential foundations of the great structure of the temple of liberty which they themselves in all their lives were to try to uphold and beautify.

I will leave to the friends of this bill the impossible task of answering that argument, but must express my profound respect for the great Northern jurist who delivered it. I will now read to the Senate, as I did two years ago, the opinion of Mr. Madison on this question. When I am supported by such authority and by arguments that breathe the very spirit of the Constitution, I am content to give my vote against this measure, it matters not how great is my desire to bestow every cordial that can heal a wound or relieve a distress of the people I love.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADISON. It is supposed by some gentlemen that Congress have authority not only to grant bounties in the sense here used, merely as a commutation for drawback, but even to grant them under a power by virtue of which they may do anything which they may think conducive to the general welfare. This, sir, in my mind raises the important and fundamental question whether the general terms which have been cited are to be considered as a sort of caption or general description of the specified powers, and as having no further meaning and giving no further powers than what are found in that specification, or as an abstract and indefinite delegation of power extending to all cases whatever, to all such at least as will admit the application of money, which is giving as much latitude as any government could well desire.

I, sir, have always conceived—I believed those who proposed the Constitution conceived—it is still more fully known and more material to observe that those who ratified the Constitution conceived that this is not an indefinite government, deriving its powers from the general terms prefixed to the specified powers, but a limited government, tied down to the specified powers, which explain and define the general terms.

It is to be recollected that the terms "common defense and general welfare" as here used are not novel terms first introduced into this Constitution. They are terms familiar in their construction and well known to the people of America. They are repeatedly found in the old Articles of Confederation, where, although they are susceptible of as great a latitude as can be given them by the context here, it was never supposed or pretended that they conveyed any such powers as is now assigned to them. On the contrary, it was always considered clear and certain that the old Congress was limited to the enumerated powers, and that the enumeration limited and explained the general terms. I ask the gentlemen themselves whether it was ever supposed or suspected that the old Congress could give away the money of the States in bounties to encourage agriculture, or for any other purpose they pleased. If such a power had been possessed by any body, it would have been much less impotent, or have borne a very different character from that universally ascribed to it.

The novel idea now annexed to those terms and never before entertained by the friends or enemies of the Government will have a further consequence, which can not have been taken into the view of the gentleman. Their construction would not only give Congress the complete legislative power I have stated; it would do more, it would supersede all the restrictions understood at present to lie in their power with respect to a judiciary. It would put it in the power of Congress to establish courts throughout the United States, with cognizance of suits between citizen and citizen, and in all cases whatsoever.

This, sir, seems to be demonstrable; for if the clause in question really authorized Congress to do whatever they think fit, provided it be for the general welfare, of which they are to be judge, and money can be applied to it, Congress must have power to create and support a judiciary establishment with a jurisdiction extending to all cases, favorable in their opinion to the general welfare, in the same manner as they have power to pass laws and apply money providing in any other way for the general welfare. I shall be reminded, perhaps, that according to the terms of the Constitution the judicial power is to extend to certain cases only, not to all cases. But this circumstance can have no effect in the argument, it being presupposed by the gentlemen that the specification of certain objects does not limit the import of the general terms. Taking these terms as an abstract and indefinite grant of power, they comprise all the objects of legislative regulations, as well such as fall under the judiciary article in the Constitution as those falling immediately under the legislative article, and if the partial enumeration of objects in the legislative article does not, as these gentlemen contend, limit the general power, neither will it be limited by the partial enumeration of objects in the judiciary article.

There are consequences, sir, still more extensive, which, as they follow clearly from the doctrine combated, must either be admitted, or the doctrine must be given up. If Congress can employ money indefinitely to the general welfare, and are the sole and supreme judges of the general welfare, they may take the care of religion into their own hands; they may appoint teachers in every State, county, and parish, and pay them out of their public Treasury; they may take into their own hands the education of children, establishing in like manner schools throughout the Union; they may assume the provision for the poor; they may undertake the regulation of all roads other than post-roads; in short, everything, from the highest object of State legislation down to the most minute object of police, would be thrown under the power of Congress; for every object I have mentioned would admit of the application of money, and might be called, if Congress pleased, provisions for the general welfare.

The language held in various discussions of this House is a proof that the doctrine in question was never entertained by this body. Arguments wherever the subject would permit have constantly been drawn from the peculiar nature of this Government, as limited to certain enumerated powers, instead of extending, like other governments, to all cases not particularly excepted. In a very late instance—I mean the debate on the representation bill—it must be remembered that an argument much used, particularly by gentlemen from Massachusetts, against the ratio of 1 for 30,000, was that this Government was unlike the State governments, which had an indefinite variety of objects within their power; that it had a small number of objects only to attend to, and, therefore, that a smaller number of Representatives would be sufficient to administer it.

Arguments have been advanced to show that because, in the regulation of trade, indirect and eventual encouragement is given to manufacturers, therefore Congress have power to give money in direct bounties, or to grant it in any other way that would answer the same purpose. But surely, sir, there is a great and obvious difference, which it can not be necessary to enlarge upon. A duty laid on imported implements of husbandry would, in its operation, be an indirect tax on exported produce; but will any one say that by virtue of a mere power to lay duties on imports Congress might go directly to the produce or implements of agriculture or to the articles exported? It is true, duties on exports are expressly prohibited; but if there were no article forbidding them, a power directly to tax exports could never be deduced from a power to tax imports, although such a power might indirectly and incidentally affect exports.

In short, sir, without going further into the subject, which I should not have here touched at all but for the reasons already mentioned, I venture to declare it as my opinion that were the power of Congress to be established in the latitude contended for it would subvert the very foundations and transmute the very nature of the limited government established by the people of America; and what inferences might be drawn or what consequences ensue from such a step it is incumbent on us all to consider.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I shall not be guilty of the vain effort of undertaking to add any light to this subject which has not been thrown upon it by that great luminary Mr. Madison, whose sun rose in the morning of our constitutional existence. That was on a debate in Congress upon a bill to subsidize or to give bounties to the cod-fisheries on the Northern coast.

I should be very glad, if I felt at liberty, to follow the example of the Senator from New Hampshire and put into my speech another able argument of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], delivered two years ago in this body. That speech and these arguments that I have read here to-day from Mr. Bayard, Mr. Curtis, and from Mr. Madison stand like a wall of adamant across the path of this bill, and I admonish Senators that they can not justify themselves in getting this $77,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States unless they can dig their way through that wall. With this remark I close my connection with this debate. I will say, however, that I intend to modify and offer to-morrow, if the bill comes up, the amendment which I have indicated heretofore.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. It is so late this afternoon that I hardly think the Senator from Tennessee would like to go on; and I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, if that is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. JACKSON. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 15, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a correction in the reference of the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Upon examination of the report and accompanying documents the Chair thinks it should go to the Committee on Patents; and the change of reference will accordingly be made.

REPORT OF SENATE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ORDNANCE, ETC.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 11, 1886.

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 11,100 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Ordnance and War Ships be printed; 100 copies for the use of the committee, to be distributed to those who contributed to the appendix to said reports, 1,000 each to the War and Navy Departments, 3,000 for the use of the Senate, and 6,000 for the use of the House of Representatives."

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the foregoing Senate concurrent resolution, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to make a favorable report thereon and recommend its passage. The estimated cost for 11,100 copies is $4,449.93.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that this is not a privileged report.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The bill provides for printing for both Houses, which I understand brings it under the rule.

The SPEAKER. But it includes more; it provides for printing to be done for the War and Navy Departments, as well as for persons who contributed to the appendix to the work.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Inasmuch as it has been read, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. MORRISON. We had better take up the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

GREEN AND BARREN RIVERS, KENTUCKY.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to submit the report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to ascertain and report at the earliest practicable period upon what terms the franchises and property of the Green and Barren River Navigation Company in Kentucky can be obtained and conveyed to the United States, so that the said streams may be opened with their large commerce free to the people of the United States.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to recommend that the same shall pass.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. WILLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Printing on House resolution 58, which I am instructed to report back with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this resolution is of the same character as that presented by the gentleman from Mississippi a moment ago and held by the Chair not to be privileged.

The Chair has always held that in order to make a matter privileged, under the rules, the whole subject to which the resolution or bill relates must be privileged; otherwise non-privileged matters could be connected with subjects which are privileged under the rule, thereby securing an advantage over other business of the House.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will withdraw the report.

REDUCTION AND CONTINGENT EXEMPTIONS OF TONNAGE DUES.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the following resolution, report that they have given consideration to the same, and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence between his office and the representatives of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Portugal, Sweden, and Norway relating to the claims of said governments to be accorded the reductions and contingent exemptions of tonnage dues accorded to vessels entering ports of the United States from certain ports named in section 14 of the shipping act, approved June 26, 1884, together with copies of any correspondence with the Attorney-General of the United States and with the Secretary of the Treasury relating thereto.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIMIT OF COST OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back a resolution of inquiry referred to that committee, and recommend the adoption of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 8, 1886.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to submit to this House his views as to limits of cost now fixed by law of the public buildings now in course of construction or authorized to be constructed, and to state whether in his judgment the limits now fixed are in each case such as will enable the Department to erect suitable buildings, of fire-proof construction, each giving sufficient space for the accommodation of the several offices to be located therein, and if, in his judgment, in any cases the said limits of cost are too low, to state what in his opinion such limits should be.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution of inquiry concerning the limit of cost of public buildings, beg leave to respectfully report—

That said resolution has been duly considered, and that, in the opinion of the committee, the end aimed at will be better attained by procuring for the information of the House detailed particulars in such cases as are likely to be submitted for the consideration of the House, and therefore recommend the adoption of the following substitute:

"Resolved, That in each case where an extension of the original limit of cost of a public building as proposed by a bill pending, that upon the application of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to the House in writing a detailed statement of the requirements of the Government in the city where said public building is located, the amount of space required by the respective offices to be provided for, the amount of space that can be furnished under the original limit, and the increase, if any, that is needed to supply the accommodations required, and such other information as may, in his judgment, tend to inform the committee and the House of the propriety of the extension of the limit proposed; also to state what amount, according to the plans of the architect, is to be applied to the external ornamentation of the building, and the amount of ornamentation proposed."

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand the reading of this resolution it is not a call for information, but confers power on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Still, I am not inclined to object to it if the resolution was so framed as to call for information generally from the Secretary of the Treasury; not simply with a view to an increase of the amount, but also with a view to a reduction of the amount appropriated or proposed to be appropriated. There were a number of bills passed last session for which no appropriation was made, and it may be very desirable to inquire whether or not the amount indicated in the law is not in excess of the amount actually required by the wants of the public service. I think the resolution should be much broader, so that the committee may obtain full information from the Secretary of the Treasury both for and against the measures proposed. It seems to me this does not call for information, but simply increases the power of the committee.

The SPEAKER. It calls for information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood the resolution simply to authorize the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to call for information. I do not object if the measure is made broader.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute again.

The substitute was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see the resolution requires the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish information in all cases. I understood it to be merely an increase of the power of the committee to call for information.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. And yet the committee ought to have more information than is provided under this resolution. There are certain cases where the amount indicated as the limit is larger than the public service requires, and it appears to me in those cases the committee would be glad to have the necessary information.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would be glad to receive all the information it can. But the committee felt the greater necessity for information was in those cases where bills were introduced proposing to increase limits originally made; and for that reason they have proposed to shape the substitute in such a way as to call for particular details from the Secretary or the Supervising Architect.

As to those cases where an original bill is proposed, those are matters that come before Congress, and gentlemen are supposed to be informed as to the necessities for public buildings in each case. And those measures are open to amendments if gentlemen think the amount excessive. But in cases where an extension of the limit is asked, that is practically saying the judgment of the House in fixing the original limit was incorrect; and in those cases the committee thought it was desirable to have as full information as possible as to why the limit was asked to be increased.

Mr. HEWITT. I shall be glad if the gentleman who has reported this resolution will inform the House whether the Secretary of the Treasury has at any time declined on the application of the committee to furnish information of this sort.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I am not informed that he has declined to do so. At the same time there is certainly no impropriety, it seems to me, in passing a resolution that would ask him to furnish this information. I might go further and state that I think it is desirable on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury that some resolution of this kind should pass; for then it becomes an executive duty to furnish the information.

Mr. HEWITT. In my experience it never has happened that any Secretary of the Treasury, or any other executive officer, has declined to answer inquiries for information as to matters of public concern; and at the same time, while not desiring to antagonize this resolution, but, on the contrary, proposing to vote for it, I think it is absolutely unnecessary to take up the time of the House with a resolution of that sort.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. WORTHINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EULOGIES ON REUBEN ELLWOOD.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I am instructed to report back with a favorable recommendation and to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 105) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Reuben Ellwood, late a Representative in Congress.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Reuben Ellwood, a Representative-elect in the Forty-ninth Congress from the State of Illinois, 12,500 copies; of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 9,500 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said Reuben Ellwood, to accompany said eulogies; and for the purpose of engraving and printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. WAIT, for six days, on account of important business.
To Mr. GLASS, for three days, to attend to important business.
To Mr. GOFF, for five days from to-day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the Chair will proceed to call the States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions. Under this call resolutions and memorials from State and Territorial Legislatures are in order and resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Departments.

FOREST FIRES.

Mr. OATES introduced a bill (H. R. 5556) to define and punish the offense of setting fire to and burning woods, grass, or forests on lands belonging to the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HERBERT introduced a bill (H. R. 5557) for the judicial ascertainment of claims against the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

GULF AND CHICAGO AIR-LINE RAILROAD.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (H. R. 5558) granting the right of way over the public lands in Alabama to the Gulf and Chicago Air-Line Railway Company, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

J. C. AND R. L. YUILLE.

Mr JONES, of Alabama, introduced a bill (H. R. 5559) for the relief of J. C. and R. L. Yuille; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LOSSES AT TRINITY SHOAL.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, also introduced a bill (H. R. 5560) to appropriate $2,000 to reimburse certain employés who lost their property by the destruction of the station at Trinity Shoal, Gulf of Mexico, off the coast of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COURTS OVER INDIAN COUNTRY.

Mr. ROGERS introduced a bill (H. R. 5561) conferring jurisdiction on the United States courts over the Indian country in certain criminal cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SIMON T. IRVIN.

Mr. ROGERS also introduced a bill (H. R. 5562) for the relief of Simon T. Irvin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN F. RICHARDSON.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 5563) for the relief of the estate of Benjamin F. Richardson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM APPERLY.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House the remainder of this day is set apart for the consideration of the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of that bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit the gentleman from North Carolina to submit a resolution before that motion is made.

Mr. BRAGG. I will yield for that purpose.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE VICE-PRESIDENT HENDRICKS.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 124) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Joint Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The motion of Mr. BRAGG was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill now pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] is entitled to the floor for forty-eight minutes, having occupied twelve minutes of his time on Saturday.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday evening, when it was suggested to me to yield the floor to allow the committee to rise, I gave way and ended my speech right in the middle of a sentence. I yielded the floor immediately because I was fatigued, and now desire to complete that sentence. I had started to say in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] that there was not a single life lost—and right there I gave way to the motion that the committee rise. I want to add—by any disobedience of orders on the part of Fitz-John Porter. I propose, as I said before, to demonstrate that fact before I am done. But I want to reply for a minute before I commence that demonstration to the constitutional arguments submitted by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK].

I introduced on Saturday evening the Constitution, showing that the rules and regulations of the Army, the Articles of War, were passed in obedience to the Constitution, and I cited the authority. That provision of the Constitution says, in substance, that Congress shall have power to make all rules and regulations for the Army and Navy. My friend from Tennessee, though a learned judge, says that the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution changes that law. Now, the only thing—and I hold the Constitution in my hand—the only thing the fifth amendment to the Constitution says in that respect is that indictments must be made in all cases of criminal prosecution, except in the Army and Navy. The only provision, then, in that article of the amendments to the Constitution is with reference to indictments which are not required to be made in the Army and Navy; that is, that you shall go on and try an offender under the military law, as you have always done, without indictment before a court-martial, and that is all there is in it and all it says; consequently it leaves the whole question of trials by court-martial right where the Constitution originally left it; that is to say, completely within the control of the Congress. That being true, Mr. Chairman, we have the right to change that provision of law.

I do not wish to take up more time than is necessary upon that proposition, but I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to what I conceive to be his very erroneous construction of the Constitution. He states the proposition very correctly, but says that the only thing now before Congress is: "Will you restore Fitz-John Porter and give him an office?" He says that can not be done because the Constitution prohibits it. I ask him how does the Constitution prohibit it? Does it prevent the restoration of Fitz-John Porter, when, as I think can be demonstrated from the Constitution itself, we have control absolutely over the whole matter? But he says you can not do it because a court-martial has found him guilty, and, therefore, you can not restore him. Again he says, going further than ever I heard in my life, that he can not hold any civil or military office because the court-martial has found him guilty and so pronounced. But, Mr. Chairman, the President pardoned him, and that pardon restored his full right to hold any office in the nation without the enactment of Congress. And another question to which I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee is, Can a pardoned man hold office, a man restored to all his rights from the effect of such a sentence by the pardon of the President of the United States, and the President had the right; is he not entitled to be placed in any office you please? Will the gentleman put himself upon the record in such an attitude as that? Does he expect anybody to follow him in such an erroneous view as that?

But I want to go a little further. The gentleman from Tennessee spends about an hour telling us that he went home from the Army powerfully embittered against the rebels, as he called them. He told us that he then thought they all ought to be shot, but that ten years of cooling time brought him to the conclusion he was willing to forgive them. I think the gentleman from Tennessee ought to have cooled a long time before that. But if after ten years of cooling time he could forgive the men whom he expected never to forgive, men who tried to destroy the best government in the world, I ask him can he not forgive a gallant Union soldier that fought under our flag? Can not the lapse of twenty years and more soften his heart so that he will forgive a gallant Union soldier?

The gentleman's argument goes upon the idea that you are not to consider anything but what was before the court-martial; that all light is to be shut out; that you have no right to go beyond what was before the court-martial. Now, I hold the Congress of the United States has the right to take light, let it come from where it may, and investigate everything anew in that light. You say you have no right to accept any new light that has come upon the subject since the court-martial convened and found Fitz-John Porter guilty. This is a very peculiar view of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I am astonished to find it shared by any number of intelligent men.

A lofty castle is built in the State of Tennessee and is so constructed that all light is excluded from it. Unless when they may see fit to open the windows from the turret to the foundation-stone of that castle there is nothing but darkness in it. The sun has arisen in heaven over the earth, and all the earth is enjoying its light; but in that castle all is darkness; you can not see a thing there. Close by that in the woods is a cabin with cracks badly stopped. When heaven's sun rises upon the earth the inhabitant of that cabin rejoices in the light that comes through the cracks, and everywhere from the rafters to the sill of that cabin there is light, and the man rejoices in the light.

I contend you have the right to take the light of heaven when it comes to you and thank God for it, let it come from where it will. But you say, and I am astonished any legal gentleman would maintain such a proposition, that light can not come to you unless it was first given to the court-martial; that if the verdict of the court-martial was a mistake it is a mistake that rules forever. I desire to remind the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] of the predicament he is in. He has so construed the Constitution of the United States and has so argued his law as if the soldier was not entitled to the same protection as the ordinary citizen. I hope he will keep that out of his printed speech so that the soldiers may not see it.

The gentleman's argument amounts to this, that while every American citizen is protected wherever he may be, while a Martin Koszta was under the flag of the United States even in a foreign nation, while our Government can protect everybody else, it can not protect a soldier. When a citizen, I care not how humble he may be, has been condemned by any court, if it is afterward found out that he is innocent, there is no time when his case can not be reached by a civil court. But here, says the distinguished lawyer from Tennessee—and I hope no man in this House will follow him in that view—here are soldiers and officers whose cases, if they have been unjustly condemned, can never again be reached. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee not to let the soldiers see that. If they do they will believe the Government is partial. If they have not the same rights as citizens the Government is not doing its duty.

Will you tell me the man who is fighting your battles, is risking his life every day, risking his honor and manhood and everything about him, is not entitled to as much protection from the Government as the citizen in civil life? Yet that is the position assumed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

I contend we have a right to all the light that is given to us; that we have the right to examine this case further than the court-martial did. I hold that we, an intelligent Congress of the United States, have the right to gather all the light that comes from every source. And I undertake to say that the trial of Fitz-John Porter by the court-martial was not a fair trial; that it did not do justice to the accused.

I want to contrast for a moment the treatment in another respect which a citizen gets before a court very different from what this soldier got. When this man who had fought for his country was before the court-martial did they give him the benefit of his good character as a man on trial in a civil court would have the benefit of his good character to rebut the presumption of guilt or any slight proof of guilt. Now, it appears from the facts of the case as they occurred before the court-martial that the fact of Fitz-John Porter being a man of honor and distinction and high and marked ability, his very services to his country and his high character were not allowed to weigh in his favor, but pointed him out as a man that ought to be cashiered! That was the view of the court-martial that tried him. It had been determined beforehand, and it is not worth while to disguise that fact, that at Washington it had been determined that General McClellan should be removed, and in order to accomplish that, as they could not charge him with a violation of any order, it was necessary to take a man that loved McClellan, a man that McClellan had confidence in, and cashier him.

Then, again, I want to call the attention of the committee to the marked difference between the manner of a trial of an accused citizen by a civil tribunal and the trial of Fitz-John Porter. On the trial of a citizen in some of the States the law used to be that an interested witness would not be permitted to testify at all. That old law has been modified of late, and now the general rule is that an interested witness may testify, but the fact of his interest is taken into consideration, and the judge instructs the jury that they are to consider that in making up their verdict. Was there a disinterested witness in the Porter case? I put it to the members of this committee, can you point me to the name of a single witness that was brought before the court-martial that tried Fitz-John Porter who was not interested in his conviction? Was General Pope interested? General Pope was hunting around for a man to put the blame on. He thought there was blame to be cast on the Union forces for being whipped on that occasion.

Now, let me say right here that I think so, too. I think there was blame to be put somewhere every time the Union forces were whipped. I blame General Lee for it; I blame Longstreet; I blame Stonewall Jackson; I blame you all that were down there fighting and whipping us. [Laughter.] That is the whole case. And now why do we want to turn round and blame a Union general that did his whole duty and did it nobly? There is no doubt that we were whipped, but why? Was it because you gentlemen on the other side had better or braver men than we had? No. Was it because you had better generals to command your corps and your brigades than we had? No. Our soldiers were as good as yours, and yours were as good as ours. Our division commanders were as good as yours. But let me say—and I say it with all due deference to the admirers of General Pope—he was not the equal of General Lee, and that is the reason we were whipped there.

General Lee had a comprehensive mind, a great mind for strategy, a mind that could in a moment seize the situation and marshal his troops to meet it. I do General Pope honor; I say that he was a gallant officer; but when you compare him to such a man as Lee, does anybody believe he can stand the comparison? Is there a man who ever read the history of the late war who believes that General Pope was the equal of General Lee? Lee was a better commanding general than Pope, and that is the reason that our forces were whipped. And I want to say this right here in reference to General Lee: I thank God his cause died; I thank God that the government for which he fought is no more; but while I do that, I undertake to say that when the people of America reach the zenith of their glory they will remember Bob Lee as a great man, a man of great power of thought and power of command, and his memory will become a part of the pride and glory of America. Yes, sir; although defeated in his cause, although the government for which he fought is dead and gone, he will be remembered as one of America's great generals. General Pope will not. Other men on our side attained much higher eminence than he did. Let me just call attention to the contrast between the conduct of General Pope and the conduct of General Lee on that occasion. Lee knew where his command was and he knew where to put it. Did Pope know as much about his own command? Why, in the very last order that he gave to McDowell and Porter he acknowledged that he did not know where his command was.

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOLFORD. Certainly.

Mr. HOUK. Did General Pope know where Fitz-John Porter was?

Mr. WOLFORD. No, sir. He did not know where his own command was. He didn't know where his command was, and he said to Porter—and my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] ought to read it and so ought my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]—he said:

> I don't know where Ricketts is. I don't know where my command is.

Did he know where the enemy was? I put it to the candor of every man on this committee, did General Pope know where the enemy was? He ordered his officers to go and attack Jackson's right and get into his rear, but there stood old Longstreet in the way. I know how it was when Longstreet stood between a man and victory. I was in an army that encountered that obstacle. Well, there stood old Longstreet, with at least two soldiers to Porter's one, and how could Porter strike Jackson's rear? Why, in the last order General Pope gave he showed that he knew nothing about where the enemy was. He said, "They will be here the day after to-morrow night;" and at that very time there they were, standing within two miles of Porter, facing him, ready for a fight. Longstreet says now:

> If Porter had attacked us we would have demolished him; we had the power to demolish him, and we would have done it.

Sir, you can not read the orders that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] cited here—I hope he will put them in his speech—you can not read those orders without seeing that Pope was ignorant of where the forces of the enemy were. Every order that he gives bears upon its face evidence of his ignorance of the positions both of his enemies and of his friends, his own troops.

Do you apologize for General Pope upon the ground that Lee was a better general, or from the fact that Pope's command was new and the ground was new so that he did not know the true state of affairs? But before he gave a positive order to attack he ought to have known whom he was attacking and where he was attacking.

There is another consideration. Gentlemen speak of obeying orders. I am for obeying orders—not blindly, but I am for that sensible obedience to orders which will produce the best results for the country. There is a higher consideration than blindly to obey orders. Says the military commission that investigated this case, "If Fitz-John Porter had made the attack it would have brought ruin to our army, and Washington city would have fallen into the hands of the enemy." Says General Longstreet, "If Porter had attacked me, I would have demolished him and his army and would have taken Washington city."

Now, what right has any gentleman to say that Fitz-John Porter "murdered" a great many men, for that was about the language of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee. Why, sir, he saved the army by what he did. I want to ask my distinguished friend from Tennessee whether he thinks there is no higher duty than obeying an order, though the man who gave it knew nothing about the true state of the case? I hold there is a higher duty than that. Every military officer who is fit to be such ought to be a father to the men in his command. Their honor, their happiness, their lives, are in his hands. Shall he blindly and foolishly subject those men to defeat and death when it is to do no good?

If you tell me that the sacrifice of part of any army is sometimes a dernier ressort—that there are cases in which a part of the army must be sacrificed for the good of the whole—I may admit it. I may admit that sometimes a military man with those under him must "lead a forlorn hope," knowing that he is to be sacrificed for the good of the army and the good of the country. I admit it; and in such a case the man dies a martyr for his country. But I deny that any commander ought to sacrifice his men when it is to accomplish no good, but simply to defeat and ruin the cause in which he is engaged.

I wish now to refer to some positions taken by my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]. I will not go before that map of which he made such constant use. There are better and more enlightened maps, published from actual survey since the war. I do not care a fig for the gentleman's map; it has nothing to do with the discussion of this case. I was amused to observe how coolly and deliberately my friend from Indiana stood before that map and pointed out errors which are now known to the world. I could not help thinking "if that map were a battery, he would not be so cool and deliberate in pointing out errors." [Laughter.]

Do you say that Fitz-John Porter ought to have attacked, that he had an order to attack Longstreet? His order was to attack the rear and flank of Jackson. General Pope labored under the delusion all the time that there was nobody there but Jackson, and that Jackson was running all the time trying to get out of his way, when, in point of fact, Jackson never thought of such a thing. Jackson managed to get the better of all the forces Pope sent against him; he was not running. General Pope in his orders and in his report did injustice to every Union general in his command, and he placed the confederates where they were not in point of fact.

My friend from Indiana says that Fitz-John Porter ought to have gone right along—ought to have precipitated an attack—ought to have obeyed the letter of Pope's order. The letter of Pope's order was to fall upon the right, and if possible get to the rear, of Jackson. But to get there he would have had to go through Longstreet's whole army. That is a fact now known to everybody. That is what Longstreet now publishes to the world. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] who shakes his head has not read Longstreet's late letter.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I have.

Mr. WOLFORD. It is now clear to the world that in order to get where Pope's order told him to get Fitz-John Porter would have had to go through Longstreet's army. But the order that was sent at thirty minutes after 4 o'clock never reached him until dark. He could not make the attack. He had been told, "The army is short of provisions, and you must fall back to Manassas." That was the last information he had.

But, says my distinguished friend from Indiana—and when he cools off he will find himself in regard to these facts in the same position as my distinguished friend from Tennessee is in regard to the law—when he cools off he will find that he is entirely mistaken. My friend from Indiana says that Fitz-John Porter ought to have gone right in there and whipped the enemy. He could not whip them. They had superior force. "But," you say, "Porter ought to have known where the enemy was." He did know. He had sent out reconnoitering parties and had knowledge upon which to act. Why did not my friend from Indiana read the whole of the record on this point? If he will put it in his speech and let it go to the country I shall be satisfied; for it will answer the positions he has taken. Fitz-John Porter knew where the enemy was and Pope did not know. Porter sent out a reconnoitering party who captured and brought in a number of Longstreet's men, and in this way he obtained information.

While that mock trial was going on—for, mark you, I claim it was nothing but mockery—all the time that mock trial was going on, here were Pope and a host of other men marshaled for the purpose of giving testimony against Fitz-John Porter and dishonoring him. They were saying, "Oh, if he had obeyed orders we would have demolished Jackson." Fitz-John Porter said, "I could not demolish Jackson, for Longstreet with his army was between Jackson and me, and I knew it." When Longstreet was there, ready for the conflict, Pope was saying, "Demolish Jackson before Longstreet comes up." Longstreet was there then. Pope admits that Porter knew he was there. McDowell knew he was there.

Although the distinguished gentleman from Indiana and the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee are to-day admitting here for the first time it has ever been admitted in this discussion that Fitz-John Porter was not a traitor to his country, it was proclaimed at the time of his trial that he was a traitor and ought to be shot. This was the atmosphere around him at that time. Every gentleman who has practiced law knows how it is when mistaken views come from high quarters and a great prejudice is arrayed against a man. The air was full of denunction of Fitz-John Porter; it was proclaimed he was a traitor and ought to be shot. One officer declared, and a distinguished gentleman has said in this discussion he heard him say in his presence, that Porter ought to be shot, and that if he had the execution of the law he would shoot him.

That was the way they talked about him during the trial, and these are the circumstances under which he was tried.

I have said that every witness was interested; and so he was. Was not McDowell interested? Surely no one here will say he was not. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] or will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] tell me that a single man was not interested who was a witness against Fitz-John Porter? It was because they were not willing to put the blame where it ought to be put—upon the confederates—and therefore they wished to find some one in our ranks upon whom the blame should be put, and then when it was done they wished him never to be forgiven. But I have said all I want to say on that proposition—whether he disobeyed any order on the 29th of August or not.

But, Mr. Chairman, suppose he did. Now would any gentleman here say that Fitz-John Porter ought to have sacrificed all his men? Will any one say that he ought to have destroyed our army, as the facts disclose he would have done if he had carried out the order which was issued to him? What was the issue? Fitz-John Porter could not have obeyed that order even if he had received it; but he said he did not receive it because Longstreet was there with two men to his one. Pope said that he was not there. That was the testimony before the court-martial. Who is right? As we now know, Fitz-John Porter undoubtedly was. Yet, sir, upon that false issue Fitz-John Porter was condemned. They believed Pope, and not Fitz-John Porter. Now everybody knows who wants to know it that from the first Fitz-John Porter was right, and things were precisely as he said they were.

My distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] said "that Fitz-John Porter ought to have sacrificed his army under such circumstances—that he ought to have obeyed his orders whatever the consequence might have been." I do not recognize that any commander has the right unnecessarily to lead to slaughter the men under his command—men who have looked up to him as their leader, their guide, and their friend, and especially when it could do no good to the country. If no good is to result, then the slaughtering of an army is the greatest possible wickedness on the part of a commander. Such is the doctrine of war. When no good is to come, when the officer who exercises the command is there and aware of all the facts, when he is perfectly informed of the danger of making the movement of his army, then he ought to be cashiered if he attempts to do that which besides destroying his army must necessarily lead to the surrender of the national capital. If Fitz-John Porter under the circumstances, understanding all the difficulties by which he was surrounded, knowing Longstreet was in his front with two men to his one—if he had gone into that fight and been shamefully whipped, which is what would have happened to him, then, I say, he ought to have been cashiered. Certainly he ought not to have been punished for having faithfully done his duty and saved the army and saved the capital.

But, sir, I wish to go further. I have been told in this debate that everything else can be reversed save the judgment of a court-martial. Now we all know, able and enlightened judges, when facts were placed before them to show error had been committed—the highest and ablest judges of England and America—have grandly said, rising up to the occasion, "We were wrong, and as far as possible we will reverse the decision we have made, correct the error, and right the wrong." The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] said that however much injustice and error might have been done by the Fitz-John Porter court-martial, at this late day that injury done him could not be righted. I was sorry to hear any such statement, and I hope we shall hear no more of it.

Oh, it is said, if you provide now that Fitz-John Porter shall be restored to the Army, it will disgrace the court-martial. We are told that Lincoln will be disgraced because he approved its findings. Is the reputation of Lincoln so precarious that it would be destroyed by the correction of an error which it is now admitted was committed during his administration? Do not say that any more. Do not let the people hear it, for they believed that Lincoln was a great man; they believed in his justice, and they knew he would not do wrong. They believed if the facts we now have before us had come to his knowledge he would have had the error corrected at once.

But it is said that Fitz-John Porter did not fight on the 29th. I think I have satisfied everybody that he ought not to have fought at that time. He disobeyed no order on the night of the 27th, and General Grant, after examining the facts, said it would have been physically impossible for him to have moved. The testimony of all the witnesses is to the effect that he could not have moved. General BRAGG said, in the presence of this committee, that he was ordered to move, and that he could not move although the wagons did not block him as they did Fitz-John Porter.
